Adams, John, second president of the United States, was born at Quincy, Mass., in 1735; was graduated at Harvard in 1755, and admitted to the bar in 1758. He was one of the delegates to the continental congress at Philadelphia, 1774, and throughout encouraged the movement for independence, in which, as chairman of the board of war, he took an active part. He was commissioner to the court of France, 1778, and was sent on an embassy to England, 1779. He was elected vice-president of the United States in 1789, and succeeded Washington as president in 1797, but in 1801 failed to gain reëlection, and then retired from public affairs. Died, 1826.

Adams, John Couch, astronomer, was born at Laneast, near Launceston, England, in 1819. He entered St. John's college, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1843; became fellow and mathematical tutor after graduation, and in 1858 Lowdean professor of astronomy. Soon after taking his degree, he undertook to find out the cause of the irregularities in the motion of Uranus, and made valuable accessions to our knowledge of the planets. He also made important researches as to the secular acceleration of the moon's mean motion, and on the November meteors. He died in 1892.

Adams, John Quincy, sixth president of the United States and son of the second president, was born in Quincy, Mass., in 1767. In his boyhood he accompanied his father on an embassy to Europe, and passed a considerable part of his youth in Paris, at The Hague, and, lastly, in London. When his father was elected president, the younger Adams was sent on an embassy to Berlin, and traveled through Silesia. On his return to America he was engaged as professor of rhetoric at Harvard university, and chosen United States senator for Massachusetts. By President Madison he was sent as plenipotentiary to Russia, and afterward to England. On this embassy he took part in the negotiation of peace with England, and assisted with his counsel the deputies sent from America to Ghent. When Monroe was elected president, he recalled Adams from Europe, and made him secretary of state. On the retirement of Monroe from office Adams gained the presidency after a hard contest against Jackson, in 1825, and on the expiration of his term of office retired to Quincy, near Boston, but in 1830 was chosen as representative of his district. He now joined the party of abolitionists, and frequently raised the whole house of representatives against himself by his incessant petitions on the slavery question. On one occasion, in 1842, in order to assert strongly in the abstract the right to petition, he went so far as to present a petition for the dissolution of the Union. This was misunderstood, and turned against him. He died at Washington during the session of congress 1848.

Adams, Maude, actress, was born at Salt Lake City in 1872; her family name was Kiskadden, but she adopted her mother's maiden name, Adams. She appeared on the stage in child's parts; went to school; joined E. H. Sothern's company, New York, at sixteen; played an ingénue rôle in the Midnight Bell; afterward joined Charles Frohman's stock company; later supported John Drew for five years; starred as Lady Babbie in The Little Minister, 1897-98; as Juliet in Romeo and Juliet, 1900; in L'Aiglon, 1900–01; in Quality Street, 1902; in The Little Minister, and Hop o' My Thumb, 1905; Peter Pan, 1906-07; What Every Woman Knows, 1908-09; Joan of Arc, 1909; Chantecler, 1910-11; etc.

Adams, Samuel, one of the American revolutionary leaders, was born in Boston, Mass., 1722. He displayed on all occasions an unflinching zeal for popular rights, and was, by the patriotic party, placed in the legislature in 1766. Adams was a member of the first congress, and signed the declaration of independence in 1776; took an active part in framing the constitution of Massachusetts, and was for several years president of the senate of that state. He held the office of lieutenant-governor from 1789 to 1794, and of governor from that time until 1797. Died, 1803.

Adams, Suzanne, operatic singer, was born at Cambridge, Mass., in 1873. She received her musical education in Paris, and made her operatic début as Juliet in Romeo and Juliet, in Paris, 1894, with the Maurice Grau opera company; at Covent Garden, London, 1898 and 1901; sang at state concerts, Buckingham palace and Windsor castle, and was presented by Queen Victoria with valuable brooches and bracelets as souvenirs; sang at Covent Garden opera and with the Maurice Grau opera company for five successive seasons, and as star in concert tours in America.

Adams, William T. See "Oliver Optic."

Addams, Jane, social reformer, head resident of Hull House, Chicago, was born at Cedarville, Ill., in 1860; graduated from Rockford college, 1881; spent two years in Europe, 1883–85; studied in Philadelphia, 1888; in 1889 opened, with Miss Ellen Gates Starr, social settlement of Hull House; inspector of streets and alleys in neighborhood of Hull House three years. Writer and lecturer on social and political reform. Author: Democracy and Social Ethics; Newer Ideals of Peace; A New Conscience and an Ancient Evil.

Addison, Joseph, English essayist, was born at Milston, England, in 1672, graduated at Oxford, and held for some years a fellowship at the university. Here some of his early writings brought him into notice and secured him a pension of $1,500 a year. Gaining this, he traveled on the continent, observing, studying, and writing. In the winter of 1701, amid the stoppages and discomforts of a journey across Mont Cenis, he composed his Letter from Italy, which contains many fine touches of description and is by far the best of his poems. At the death of King William his pension was stopped, and having no means of his own his prospects were gloomy indeed, until a lucky chance put him on his feet again. The ministry desired a poem written in praise of Marlborough, who had just won the battle of Blenheim. Addison wrote the poem, The Campaign, and was rewarded with the office of excise commissioner. He held other public offices, which kept him from writing much for the next six years. In 1710 he began to bring out his famous essays. These he contributed to the Tatler, next to the Spectator, and afterward to the Guardian, which he published in conjunction with his friend, Richard Steele. The most successful of these periodicals was the Spectator. It was a daily paper, but without any news. It took the fancy of Londoners at the time, and though it ran only a few months has been renowned ever since. Died, 1719.

Ade (ād), George, author and dramatist, was born at Kentland, Ind., 1866; graduated from Purdue university, 1887; in newspaper work in Lafayette, Ind., 1887–90; on Chicago Record, 1890–1900. Author: Creed and Deed; The Moral Instruction of Children; Life and Destiny; Marriage and Divorce; Religion of Duty.

Adrian IV. (ā'-drĭ-an), named Nicholas Breakspeare, the only English pope, was born about 1100. He left England a poor man, went to Paris, became an ardent student, and was soon known for his learning and zeal. He was chosen abbot, then cardinal, and lastly pope, in 1154. He was vigorous in maintaining his authority at Rome and throughout Europe. He died in Italy in 1159.

Aerenthal (ă'-rĕn-tăl), Alois Leopold Baptist, Baron von, Austro-Hungarian minister for foreign affairs, was born in 1854. His family is of German origin, but has long been settled in Bohemia. He was educated at Prague and Bonn universities, and as a boy learned both Czech and German. He entered the diplomatic service in 1877, and served in Paris and St. Petersburg; became secretary to Count Kalnoky in the foreign office in 1883, councillor of legation at St. Petersburg in 1888, minister to Rumania in 1895, and ambassador to Russia in 1899. In October, 1906, he was appointed to succeed Count Goluchowski. Died, 1912.

Æschines (ĕs'-kĭ-nēz), an Athenian orator, second only to Demosthenes, was born 389 B. C. Demosthenes advocated strenuous opposition to Philip of Macedon, then pursuing his designs for the subjugation of the several Greek states, while Æschines, as head of the peace-party, was a member of more than one embassy sent by the Athenians to Philip. The result justified the sagacious fears of Demosthenes. But when it was proposed to reward him with a golden crown, Æschines indicted the proposer, Ctesiphon, for bringing forward an illegal proposition. Demosthenes replied in perhaps the greatest of his speeches; and Æschines, defeated, had to leave Athens. He went into exile at Rhodes, where, tradition says, he established a school of eloquence. Died at Samos, 314 B. C.

Æschylus (ĕs'-kĭ-lŭs). See page 12.

Æsop (ē'-sŏp), celebrated fabulist, said to have been born at Phrygia about 620 B. C. He was as deformed in body as accomplished in mind, and was originally a slave at Athens and at Samos. Having gained freedom by his wit, he traveled through Asia Minor and Egypt, and attached himself to the court of Crœsus, king of Lydia. Sent by that monarch upon an embassy to Delphi, he so offended the inhabitants by the keenness of his sarcasms that they hurled him from a rock into the sea. He died about 564 B. C.

Aëtius (ā-ē'-shĭ-ŭs), Roman general, born about 396, in Moesia; in 433 became patrician, consul, and general-in-chief, and as such maintained the empire against the barbarians for twenty years, defeating West Goths, Burgundians, rebellious Gauls, and Franks. His crowning victory was that at Chalons over Attila in 451; three years later the emperor Valentinian III., jealous of his greatness, stabbed him to death with his own hand.

Agamemnon (ăg-ȧ-mĕm'-nŏn), king of Mycenæ and Argos, son of Atreus and Eriphyle, and brother of Menelaus, was commander-in-chief of the Grecian army at the siege of Troy. Returning from Troy, Agamemnon was treacherously murdered by his wife, who, during his absence, had formed an attachment with Ægisthus, son of the noted Thyestes. This catastrophe is the subject of the Agamemnon of Æschylus, one of the most sublime compositions in the range of the Grecian drama.

Agassiz (ăg'-ȧ-sē), Alexander, naturalist, born in Neuchâtel, Switzerland, 1835; graduated at Harvard, 1855, Lawrence scientific school, 1857; on coast survey of California, 1859; assistant in zoölogy, Harvard, 1860–65; developed and was superintendent, 1865–69, Calumet & Hecla copper mines, Lake Superior; curator museum comparative zoölogy, Cambridge, 1874–85; afterward engaged in zoölogical investigation. Appointed director museum comparative zoölogy, Cambridge, 1902; appointed by Emperor William III. of Germany member order of merit, 1902; was member of academy of science, Paris, and president of national academy of science. Author: Explorations of Lake Titicaca; List of the Echinoderms; Three Cruises of the Blake; Revision of the Echini; Pacific Coral Reefs; Coral Reefs of the Maldives; Panamic Deep Sea Echini, etc. Died, 1910.

Agassiz, Louis Johann Rudolph, eminent naturalist, was born in Switzerland in 1807, the son of a Swiss Protestant clergyman. He studied medicine and graduated at Munich, but devoted himself principally to ichthyology, and was employed to classify and arrange the collection brought from Brazil by Martius and Spix. In 1846 he came to America, where he was well received, and in 1848 accepted the chair of zoölogy and geology at Harvard college. In 1865 he visited Brazil, and on his return placed the large collection he had made in the museum of Cambridge. He wrote Glaciers, Outlines of Comparative Physiology, An Essay on Classification, and numerous other valuable works, and was to the last a disbeliever in the Darwinian theory of evolution. Died, 1873.

Agathocles (ȧ-găth'-ō-klēz), tyrant of Syracuse, was born at Thermæ, Sicily, about 361 B. C. From 310 for four years he fought unsuccessfully with the Carthaginians in Africa. A favorite killed him with a poisoned toothpick in 289 B. C.

Agesilaus (ȧ-jĕs-ĭ-lā'-ŭs), king of Sparta from 397 B. C., was one of the most brilliant soldiers of antiquity. Called on by the Ionians to assist them against Artaxerxes, he commenced a splendid campaign in Asia; but the Corinthian war recalled him to Greece. At Coronea he defeated the allied forces, and peace was concluded in favor of Sparta. Afterward, in the Theban war, though hard pressed by Pelopidas and Epaminondas, and defeated at Mantinea, he bravely defended his country. He was born in 444 B. C., and died in Egypt in 360 B. C.

Agnew (ăg'-nū), Daniel Hayes, surgeon, was born in Pennsylvania in 1818. He established the Philadelphia school of operative surgery, and founded the present pathological museum of the Philadelphia hospital. In 1863 he was appointed assistant lecturer on clinical surgery at the university of Pennsylvania, and surgeon of Wills ophthalmic hospital. In 1865 he was elected surgeon of the Pennsylvania and Orthopedic hospitals; in 1870 appointed professor of operative surgery in the university of Pennsylvania, and in 1871 became professor of the principles and practice of surgery in the same institution, and professor of clinical surgery in the university hospital. A most skillful, rapid, and efficient operator, his reputation as a surgeon was worldwide. When President Garfield was shot he was called as the chief consulting surgeon. His writings are voluminous, but his best work is a large and exhaustive one on operative surgery. He died in 1892.

Agricola (ȧ-grĭk'-ō-lȧ), Cnæus Julius, a Roman of the imperial times, distinguished not less by his great abilities as a statesman and a soldier than by the beauty of his private character; born at Forum Julii (now Fréjus, in Provence, France) 37 A. D. Having served with distinction in Britain, Asia, and Aquitania, and gone through the round of civil offices, he was, in 77 A. D., elected consul, and in the following year proceeded as governor to Britain — the scene of his military and civil administration during the next seven years. He was the first Roman general who effectually subdued the island, and the only one who displayed as much genius and success in training the inhabitants to the amenities of civilization as in breaking their rude force in war. Died, 93.

Agrippa (ȧ-grĭp'-ȧ), Marcus Vipsanius, a Roman citizen who lived 63–12 B. C., and rose to an exalted position. He was the chief instrument of Octavius in establishing the empire. In 40 he took Perusia from Lucius Antonius and Sipontum from Mark Antony. In 36 he defeated Sextus Pompey at Mylæ and Naulochus, and in 31 chiefly contributed to the great victory at Actium. Agrippa was prætor in 41, consul (with Octavius) in 37, 28, and 27, when he built the Pantheon, ædile in 33, and tribune from 18 until his death. Rome owed to him the restoration and construction of several aqueducts and of the Pantheon, besides other public works of ornament and utility.

Aguesseau (dā'-gĕ'-sō'), Henri François d', a distinguished French jurist and statesman, born at Limoges in 1668; was in 1690 advocate-general at Paris, and at the age of thirty-two procureur-general of the parliament. He risked disgrace with Louis XIV. by successfully opposing the famous papal bull Unigenitus. He was made chancellor in 1717, was deprived of his office in 1718 on account of his opposition to Law's system of finance, but had to be recalled in 1720. In 1722 he had to retire a second time but was recalled in 1727 by Cardinal Fleury, and in 1737 again secured the chancellorship, which he held until 1750. He died in 1751.

Aguinaldo (ä-gē-näl'-dō), Emilio, Philippino general, was born at Imus, a village near Cavite, Luzon, in 1870; educated at St. Thomas by the Dominicans. During the rebellion of the Philippinos against Spain he was in constant fear of assassination, as the Spanish government offered a reward of $25,000 for his head. He was the chief of the insurgents and a capable man; acting as a dictator, he assumed sovereign power. In March, 1901, was captured by General Frederick Funston, a Kansas volunteer, after being in constant flight.

Ahab (ā'-hăb), the son and successor of Omri, was king of Israel from 875–853 B. C. He married Jezebel, through whose injurious influence the Phœnician worship of Baal was introduced, the king himself turning to idolatry and the priests and prophets of Jehovah being cruelly persecuted. Ahab prosecuted three wars, with various success, against Benhadad, king of Syria; but in the last campaign he was killed by an arrow. His whole family was afterward extirpated under King Jehu.

Aikin (ā'-kĭn), John, English physician, was born at Kibworth, Leicestershire, in 1747. After studying at Edinburgh and London, he took his M. D. at Leyden in 1780, and practiced in Chester, Warrington, Yarmouth, and London; but in 1798 retired to Stoke-Newington, where he died in 1822. A friend of Priestley, E. Darwin, John Howard, and Southey, he was a voluminous author. His works include: Lives of Howard, Selden, and Usher; the General Biography (10 vols.), and the well-known Evenings at Home (6 vols.), written in conjunction with his sister, Mrs. Barbauld.

Ainsworth (ānz'-wûrth), William Harrison, English novelist, was born at Manchester, England, in 1805, and educated at the grammar school. A solicitor's son, in his seventeenth year he was articled to a solicitor; and, on his father's death in 1824, he went to London to complete his legal studies. Two years later, however, he married a publisher's daughter, and himself turned publisher for eighteen months. He had contributed some articles to magazines prior to 1822, and his earliest success was Rookwood, with its vivid description of Dick Turpin's ride to York. By 1881 he had published no fewer than thirty-nine novels. Seven of them were illustrated by Cruikshank — viz.: Rookwood, Jack Sheppard, Tower of London, Guy Fawkes, Miser's Daughter, Windsor Castle, and St. James's. To these may be added his Crichton, Old St. Paul's, and Lancashire Witches, as possessing some intrinsic claim to literary merit. He died at Reigate in 1882.

Airy (âr'-ĭ), George Biddell, English mathematician, astronomer, physicist, and engineer, was born at Alnwick, England, in 1801; was graduated at Trinity college, Cambridge, in 1823; soon after published his Mathematical Tracts on the Lunar and Planetary Theories, the Figures of the Earth, and the Undulatory Theory of Optics; in 1825 discovered astigmatism; in 1826 was appointed Lucasian professor of mathematics, and in 1828 Plumian professor of astronomy at Cambridge, and director of the observatory; in 1836 succeeded Pond as astronomer-royal at the Greenwich observatory, a post which he held for forty-six years, equipping the observatory with an entirely new outfit of instruments mostly of his own design, and which were for a long time the most accurate in use. Here he introduced the systematic observation of the magnetic elements, and carried on investigations in the lunar theory, the magnetism of iron ships, the density of the earth, the length of the seconds-pendulum, and a great variety of other subjects. After his retirement from the direction of the Greenwich observatory, in 1881, he was continuously engaged upon his numerical lunar theory. He died in 1892.

Akbar (ăk'-bär), celebrated Mogul emperor, was born at Amarkote in Sindh in 1542. When he ascended the throne, only a small part of what had formerly belonged to the Mogul empire acknowledged his authority, and he devoted himself with wonderful success to the recovery of the revolted provinces. He encouraged commerce, and had the land carefully measured so that the taxes should be fair. His people were of different races and religions, but he was just and tolerant to all. He founded schools and encouraged learning. Measures like these gained for him the title of "guardian of mankind," and caused him to be held up as a model to Indian princes of later times. He died in 1605.

Aked, Charles Frederic, clergyman, was born at Nottingham, England, 1864; was educated at Midland Baptist college, and University college, in Nottingham, and received the degree D. D., Temple college, Philadelphia, 1901, Brown, 1907. Ordained to Baptist ministry, 1886; pastorates: Syston, Leicestershire, 1886–88; St. Helen's and Earlstown, 1888–90; Pembroke chapel, Liverpool, 1890–1907; Fifth Avenue Baptist church, New York, 1907–11; First Congregational church, San Francisco, since 1911; made annual lecture and preaching trips to United States, 1893–1907. Author: The Courage of the Coward, A Ministry of Reconciliation, Mercies New Every Morning, and many social, religious, and political pamphlets.

Akenside (ā'-kĕn-sīd), Mark, an English poet, was born in 1721, died in 1770. He owes his position among the poets chiefly to his Pleasures of the Imagination, a poem which at once became famous.

Alarcón y Mendoza (ä-lär-kōn' ē mĕn-dō'-thä), Don Juan Ruiz de, one of the most distinguished dramatic poets of Spain, born in Mexico about the beginning of the seventeenth century. He went to Europe about 1622, and in 1628 published a volume containing eight comedies, and in 1634 another containing twelve. One of them, called La Verdad Sospechosa, "The Truth Suspected," furnished Corneille with the groundwork and greater part of the substance of his Menteur. His Tejedor de Segovia, "Weaver of Segovia," and Las Paredes Oyen, "Walls have Ears," are still performed on the Spanish stage. He died in 1639.

Alaric I. (ăl'-ȧ-rĭk), king of the Visigoths, was born about the middle of the fourth century, and is first mentioned in history in 394 A. D., when Theodosius the Great gave him the command of his Gothic auxiliaries. The dissensions between Arcadius and Honorius, the sons of Theodosius, inspired Alaric with the intention of attacking the Roman empire. In 396 he ravaged Greece, from which he was driven by the Roman general, Stilicho, but made a masterly retreat to Illyria, of which Arcadius, frightened at his successes, appointed him governor. In 400 he invaded Italy, but was defeated by Stilicho at Pollentia in 403, and induced to transfer his services from Arcadius to Honorius on condition of receiving 4,000 pounds of gold. Honorius having failed to fulfill this condition, Alaric made a second invasion of Italy, during which he besieged Rome thrice. The first time, 408, the city was saved by paying a heavy ransom; the second, 409, it capitulated, and Honorius was deposed, but shortly afterward restored. His sanction of a treacherous attack on the forces of Alaric brought about the third siege, and the city was taken in 410, and sacked for six days, Alaric, however, doing everything in his power to restrain the violence of his followers. He quitted Rome with the intention of reducing Sicily and Africa, but died at Cosenza in 410.

Albani (äl-bä'-nē), Madame (née Emma La Jeunesse), vocalist, was born in 1852, at Chambly, Canada, and was trained in music by her father. At twelve she made her début at Albany, N. Y., whence she assumed the professional name of Albani. She studied at Paris and Milan, and in 1870 sang at Messina with a success that attended her subsequently at London and Paris, the United States, St. Petersburg, Berlin, etc. In 1878 she married Ernest Gye, eldest son of the director of the royal Italian opera, London, and has since resided in that city.

Alberoni (äl-bā-rō'-nē), Giulio, cardinal and statesman, was born at Firenzuola, near Piacenza, 1664. In 1713 the duke of Parma employed him as his agent in Madrid. Quickly gaining the favor of Philip V., in 1714 he became prime-minister of Spain, and in 1717 was made a cardinal. His internal administration was liberal and wise, and he did much to develop the resources of Spain, while he remodeled the army and fleet, and increased the foreign commerce. To gratify the queen, he suddenly invaded Sardinia, in violation of the peace of Utrecht — a step which made England, France, Austria, and Holland form, in 1719, the "quadruple alliance." He sought to unite Peter of Russia and Charles XII. with him, to plunge Austria into a war with the Turks, to stir up an insurrection in Hungary, and to bring about the downfall of the regent in France. But Philip lost courage, and concluded a treaty, its chief condition being the dismissal of the cardinal. He was ordered to leave Spain without delay, and fled to a monastery at Bologna. On the death of the pope in 1721, he repaired to Rome, and took part in the election of Innocent XIII., who, like his two successors, befriended the great exile. Alberoni, however, soon retired to Piacenza, where he died in 1752.

Albert, prince of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and husband of Queen Victoria of England, was born near Coburg, Germany, in 1819. He married Queen Victoria in 1840; soon after he was made field-marshal in the British army, and in 1857 received the title of prince consort. He acquired great influence in public affairs as the prudent and trusted adviser of the queen, and became popular throughout England. He died in 1861.

Alberti (ăl-bĕr'-tē), Leon Battista, an Italian architect, and writer on art and poetry, was born at Florence, Italy, in 1404; died at Rome in 1472. He was much employed by Pope Nicholas V. He completed the Pitti palace at Florence, and designed the church of St. Frances at Rimini. His chief book, De Re Ædificatoria, is highly valued.

Albertus Magnus (ăl-bĕr'-tŭs măg'-nŭs), count of Bollstädt, the Doctor Universalis of the schoolmen, was born at Lauingen, in Swabia, about 1193, studied at Padua, and, entering the newly founded Dominican order, taught in the schools of Hildesheim, Ratisbon, and Cologne. In 1245–54 he lectured at Paris, in 1254 became provincial of the Dominicans in Germany, and in 1260 was named bishop of Ratisbon. But in 1262 he retired to his convent at Cologne to devote himself to literary pursuits, and there he died in 1280. Of his works the most notable are the Summa Theologiæ and the Summa de Creaturis. Albertus excelled all his contemporaries in the wideness of his learning, and in legend appears as a magician.

Alboin (ăl'-boin), king of the Lombards from about 561 to 573, died in Verona in the latter year. In 566 he destroyed the kingdom of the Gepidæ. In 568 he conquered Italy as far south as the Tiber, and established the kingdom of the Lombards, with Pavia as its capital. He was murdered during a carousal at the instigation of his wife, Rosamunda, whom he had commanded to drink from her father's skull.

Albuquerque (ăl-bŏŏ-kĕr'-kĕ), Affonso de, an eminent Portuguese admiral, born in 1453, died in 1515. Portugal having subjected to its power a large part of the western coast of Africa, and begun to extend its sway in the East Indies, Albuquerque was appointed viceroy of the Portuguese acquisitions in this quarter, and arrived in 1503 with a fleet on the coast of Malabar. His career here was extremely successful, he having extended the Portuguese power over Malabar, Ceylon, the Sunda islands, and the peninsula of Malacca, and made the Portuguese name respected by all the nations and princes of India.

Alcæus (ăl-sē'-ŭs), of Mitylene, one of the greatest lyric poets of Greece, flourished about the end of the seventh or the beginning of the sixth century B. C. He was the inventor of the form of verse which after him is called the Alcaic, and which Horace, the happiest of his imitators, transplanted into the Latin language.

Alcibiades (ăl-sĭ-bī'-ȧ-dēz), Athenian general, was born at Athens 450 B. C. He lost his father in the battle of Chæronea, and was educated in the house of Pericles, his uncle. In his youth he gave evidence of his future greatness, excelling both in mental and bodily exercises. His handsome person, his distinguished parentage, and the high position of Pericles procured him a multitude of friends and admirers. Socrates was one of the former, and gained considerable influence over him, but was unable to restrain his love of luxury and dissipation, which found ample means of gratification in the wealth that accrued to him by his union with Hipparete, the daughter of Hipponicus. After a distinguished career in military life in Greece and Persia he was put to death 404 B. C.

Alcott (ŏl'-kŭt), Amos Bronson, American philosopher, was born at Wolcott, Conn., in 1799; died in 1888. In 1834–37 he conducted a school in Boston. His system was denounced, however, by the press, and he left Boston for Concord, Mass., where he gave his attention to natural theology and reform in education, diet, and social institutions. Returning from a visit to England in 1842, he brought with him two friends, one of whom, Charles Lane, bought a farm near Harvard, Mass., and proceeded to found a new community, since called transcendentalists. The scheme failed, and Alcott thenceforward devoted himself to lecturing, or rather conversing, on a wide range of subjects, theoretical and practical. He published several books, of which Concord Days, the latest, contains his personal reminiscences.

Alcott, Louisa May, daughter of Amos Bronson Alcott, a justly famous American authoress, was born in Germantown, Pa., in 1832. Her first volume was Flower Fables, published in 1855. During the civil war she was a volunteer nurse in the South, and wrote Hospital Sketches in 1863. Little Women was published in 1868, and was followed at short intervals by Little Men, Work, Rose in Bloom, Jo's Boys, etc. She died in 1888 at Boston, Mass.

Alcuin (ăl'-kwĭn), or Flaccus Albinus, the most distinguished scholar of the eighth century, the confidant and adviser of Charlemagne, was born at York about 735. At his death in 804 he left, besides numerous theological writings, a number of elementary works on philosophy, mathematics, rhetoric, and philology; also poems and a great number of letters.

Alden, Henry Mills, author and classical scholar, editor Harper's Magazine since 1869, was born at Mount Tabor, near Danby, Vt., 1836; graduated from Williams college in 1857, Andover theological seminary in 1860; L. H. D., 1890, LL. D., 1907, Williams. Lecturer 1863-64, before Lowell institute, Boston, subject, "Structure of Paganism"; managing editor Harper's Weekly, 1863–69. Author: God in His World; A Study of Death; Harper's Pictorial History of the Great Rebellion (with A. H. Guernsey), etc.

Alden, John, one of the pilgrims to Plymouth, Mass., was born in England in 1599, died at Duxbury, Mass., in 1687. He was one of the signers of the compact in the cabin of the Mayflower. Alden married Priscilla Mullens, to whom his first proposal was in behalf of Miles Standish, but who indicated her preference for Alden over the soldier. A poem by Longfellow has this incident for its theme. He was a magistrate for more than fifty years, and greatly assisted in the government of the infant colony.

Alderman, Edwin Anderson, educator, president of the university of Virginia since 1904, was born at Wilmington, N. C., in 1861; graduated from the university of North Carolina, 1882; D. C. L., university of the South, 1896; LL. D., Tulane, 1898, Johns Hopkins, 1902, Columbia, 1905, Yale, 1905, university of North Carolina, 1906; assistant state superintendent of schools, North Carolina, 1889–92; professor of English, state normal college, 1892; professor pedagogy, university of North Carolina, 1892–96; president of same 1896–99; president Tulane university, 1899–1904. He is well known as a speaker and lecturer. Author: Life of William Hooper, signer of the Declaration; School History of North Carolina; Life of J. L. M. Curry.

Aldrich, Nelson Wilmarth, legislator, ex-United States senator, was born at Foster, R. I., in 1841; received an academic education; president of the Providence common council, 1872-73; member of the Rhode Island general assembly, 1875–77, serving in 1876-77 as speaker of the house of representatives; elected to the house of representatives of the forty-sixth congress and reëlected to the forty-seventh congress; elected, 1881, to the United States senate to succeed Ambrose E. Burnside, and was reëlected in 1886, in 1892, 1898, and in 1905. For many years he was the republican leader of the senate, and was co-author of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. He retired from the senate, 1911.

Aldrich, Thomas Bailey, poet and editor, was born in Portsmouth, N. H., in 1836. While engaged in the office of a New York merchant he began to write verses, the success of which soon induced him to enter on a literary career. His first volume, miscellaneous poems, was published in 1855, and was called The Bells; afterward he published Babie Bell, several other volumes of poems, and The Story of a Bad Boy. Aldrich was an industrious contributor to our best periodicals, and was also on the editorial staff of the Home Journal, 1856–59, and Every Saturday. In 1881 he became editor of the Atlantic Monthly, but resigned in 1890. Died at Boston, Mass., 1907.

Alembert (ȧ'-läɴ'-bâr'), Jean le Rond d', a celebrated man of letters and mathematician, the natural son of Madame de Tencin and the poet Destouches; was born in Paris, France, in 1717. He was the friend of Voltaire, and acquired high esteem by his works, which fill eighteen volumes. The most important of these are his Treatise on Dynamics; Theory of the Winds; Precession of the Equinoxes, and Essay on the Resistance of Fluids. His treatises on dynamics and fluids at once established for him a reputation in science. Died, 1783.

Alexander the Great. See page 419.

Alexander I., emperor of Russia, 1801–25, was born at St. Petersburg in 1777. With a humane and benevolent disposition the "Northern Telemaque" was imbued by Laharpe with the enlightened principles of the age. Professor Kreft instructed him in experimental physics, and Pallas in botany. In 1793 he married Elizabeth, daughter of Karl Ludwig, crown prince of Baden, and, on the assassination of his father, Paul, in 1801, succeeded him upon the throne. He encouraged education and science, and carried out many reforms. In 1805 he joined the coalition against Napoleon, and was present at the battle of Austerlitz. In 1808 he conquered Finland, and in 1806–12 waged a successful war against Turkey. He died at Taganrog in 1825.

Alexander II., emperor of Russia, 1855–81, was born in 1818. He was carefully educated by his father, Nicholas I., traveled through Germany, and there in 1841 married the princess Marie, daughter of the grand-duke of Hesse. He succeeded to the throne in 1855, and a year later the Crimean war was terminated by the peace of Paris. The grand achievement of his reign, which was in great measure his own deed, was the emancipation of the serfs — twenty-three million souls — in 1861. Legal and municipal reforms followed, and in 1865 Alexander established elective representative assemblies in the provinces. He resisted strenuously all foreign interference with Polish affairs during the insurrection of 1863, which was suppressed with great severity. During his reign, the Russian empire was widely extended in the Caucasus and in central Asia. During the Franco-German war of 1870-71, Alexander maintained a sympathetic attitude toward Germany, a policy which was continued in subsequent alliances both with that country and Austria. The czar shared the national sympathy with the Slavonic races under Turkish rule, and took the field with the army during the victorious war between Russia and Turkey in 1877-78. By his establishment of schools and internal improvements he did more to build up Russia than any other emperor since Peter the Great. He was assassinated at St. Petersburg in 1881.

Alexander III., emperor of Russia, 1881–94, was born in 1845. He showed vigor in government and ability in repressing the nihilists, who made several attempts on his life, and who assassinated his father, Alexander II. The harsh laws against the Jews and the severe famine of 1892 are among the later events of his reign. In 1866 he married Princess Dagmar, daughter of Christian IX., king of Denmark. His son, Nicholas II., succeeded Alexander III., who died at Livadia, Crimea, in 1894.

Alexander, Archibald, divine and educator, was born in Virginia in 1772. He was self-educated; was led to religious study by the great revival of 1789-90, was licensed to preach in 1791, and spent some years as itinerant missionary. In 1796 he became president of Hampden Sidney college, resigning in 1801; was pastor of Pine Street Presbyterian church, Philadelphia, in 1807; in 1810 he received the degree of D. D., and was elected president of Union college in Georgia. In 1812 he was chosen first theological professor in Princeton theological seminary, holding the place until his death. His best known work is Outlines of the Evidences of Christianity, which has been reproduced in many languages. He wrote Treatise on the Canon of the Old and New Testaments; History of the Patriarchs; Essays on Religious Experience; History of African Colonization; History of the Log College, and a History of the Israelitish Nation. A work on Moral Science was published after his death, and he left several religious works unpublished. He died in 1851.

Alexander, De Alva Stanwood, ex-congressman, lawyer, was born in 1846 in Richmond, Maine; at the age of fifteen entered the army, serving until the close of the war, as a private soldier; upon leaving the service he prepared for college, and in 1870 took his bachelor's degree from Bowdoin college, of which he is now an overseer and which has conferred upon him the degree of LL. D.; in 1874 located at Indianapolis, Ind., where he practiced law; in 1881 was appointed fifth auditor of the treasury department; moved to Buffalo, N. Y., in 1885; in 1889–93 was United States attorney for the northern district of New York; he published Political History of the State of New York, 1906–09; member of congress, 1897–1911.

Alexander, George, actor, was born at Reading, England, in 1858, and made his professional début at Nottingham in 1879. He has played in Lady Windermere's Fan; The Second Mrs. Tanqueray; The Masqueraders; Prisoner of Zenda; As You Like It; The Princess and the Butterfly; The Tree of Knowledge; Much Ado About Nothing; The Ambassador; The Man of Forty; Rupert of Hentzau; A Debt of Honour; Wisdom of the Wise; The Awakening; The Wilderness; The Importance of being Earnest; Paolo and Francesca; If I Were King; Old Heidelberg; Love's Carnival; Saturday to Monday; The Garden of Lies; Mollentrave on Women; The Man of the Moment; John Chilcote, M. P.; His House in Order; John Glayde's Honour; The Thief, and The Thunderbolt. He represents South St. Pancras in London county council.

Alexander Nevski (nĕf'-skĕ), Russian hero and saint, was born at Vladimir in 1219, the son of the grand-duke Jaroslav of Novgorod. He received the surname of Nevski on account of the splendid victory over the Swedes which he achieved in 1240 on the Neva, in the province where St. Petersburg now stands. In 1242, on the ice of Lake Peipus, he defeated the Livonian knights of the sword. At the death of his father, in 1247, he became grand duke of Vladimir, when Pope Innocent IV. made a diplomatic attempt to reunite the Greek and Roman churches, and with this view sent an embassy to Alexander which proved ineffectual. To the end of his life he remained a vassal of the Tartars or Mongols. He died in 1263.

Alexander Severus, Roman emperor, 222–235, born about 208, was the cousin, adopted son, and successor to Heliogabalus. Although a pagan he reverenced the doctrines of Christianity and often quoted the "golden rule." His first expedition against Artaxerxes, king of Persia, was happily terminated by a speedy overthrow of the enemy. But during a campaign against the Germans on the Rhine, to defend the frontiers of the empire from their incursions, an insurrection broke out among his troops, headed by Maximin, in which he was murdered, 235.

Alexeieff (ă-lĕks-ā'-yĕf), Eugenii Ivanovitch, Russian admiral, was born in 1844. He was educated in the naval school of Russia; lieutenant, 1867; commander of the Africa, 1878; attaché naval à Paris, 1884; post-captain, 1886; commander of cruiser Admiral Kornilow, 1887–91; rear-admiral, 1892, and assistant head of chief naval staff office; chief of eastern fleet during Japanese-Chinese war, 1897. In 1898 he was made vice-admiral, and commander of Kwangtung province. In 1900–01 he was chief of the Russian Pacific squadron, but his conduct of affairs during the Russo-Japanese war led to his recall to Russia.

Alexius I. Comnenus (ă-lĕk'-sĭ-ŭs kŏm-nē'-nŭs), one of the ablest Byzantine emperors, was born at Constantinople, 1048; he was the nephew of the emperor Isaac Comnenus, and in 1081 was elevated by his soldiers to the throne. Everywhere he was encompassed with foes. The Scythians and Turks were pouring down from the north and north-east; the fierce Normans were menacing his western provinces; and, in 1096, the myriad warriors of the first crusade burst into his empire on their way to Palestine. Died in 1118.

Alfieri (äl-fī-ā'-rē), Vittorio, Count, Italian dramatic poet, was born in Piedmont in 1749. At Turin, in 1772, he left the military service and devoted himself to literary occupation. He began at a mature age to learn Latin, and also to study the Tuscan dialect, for which purpose he went to Tuscany. On his journey thither he made the acquaintance of the countess of Albany, to whom he became deeply attached and to whom he was privately married. He left twenty-one tragedies and six comedies, besides various odes and sonnets. Died in Florence in 1803.

Alfonso V., king of Aragon, Naples, and Sicily, was born in 1385. He received the surname of "the magnanimous" because on his accession to the throne he destroyed a document containing the names of all the grandees who were hostile to him. His historical importance arises from his having brought southern Italy under the dominion of Aragon. He honorably distinguished himself by his patronage of letters. Died at Naples in 1458.

Alfonso X., surnamed "the astronomer," "the philosopher," or "the wise," king of Leon and Castile, was born, 1221; succeeded his father, Ferdinand III., in 1252; died at Seville, 1284. He was the most learned prince of his time, and acquired lasting fame through the completion of the code of laws commenced by his father, and called Leyes de las Partidas, which in 1501 became the universal law of the land. He is credited with a history of the church and of the crusades, and is said to have ordered a translation of the Bible into Spanish. He improved the Ptolemaic planetary tables.

Alfonso XIII., king of Spain, is the son of the late King Alfonso XII. and Queen Maria Christina, a daughter of the late Karl Ferdinand, archduke of Austria. He was born after his father's death, in 1886, and his childhood was spent at Madrid and the palace of Miramar, in San Sebastian. In Spain the sovereign comes of age at sixteen, and during the king's minority his mother reigned as queen regent. On May 17, 1902, the regency ceased, and Alfonso XIII. assumed his full powers. On May 31, 1906, he married Princess Ena of Battenberg, and as the king and queen were returning to the palace they narrowly escaped death from a bomb thrown by an anarchist. The king is a general in the British army, and received the royal Victorian chain in June, 1905.

Alfred the Great. See page 435.

Algardi (äl-găr'-dē), Alessandro, noted Italian sculptor, was born at Bologna, Italy, 1602. His chief work is a colossal relievo, in St. Peter's, of "Pope Leo restraining Attila from marching on Rome." Died at Rome in 1654.

Alger (ăl'-jĕr), Russell Alexander, statesman, capitalist; born in Lafayette township, Medina county, Ohio, 1836; orphaned at twelve years of age and for seven years worked on farm, earning money to defray expenses at Richfield, Ohio, academy during winters. Taught school two winters; admitted to bar, 1859; began practice in Cleveland; removed to Michigan January 1, 1860; began lumbering in a small way; enlisted 1861, and served as captain and major Second Michigan, lieutenant-colonel Sixth Michigan, colonel Fifth Michigan, cavalry; brevetted brigadier-general and major-general volunteers. In lumber business after war; head of Alger, Smith & Co., and Manistique lumbering company, owners and operators of extensive timber tracts and mills in Michigan and Minnesota. Was governor of Michigan, 1885 and 1886; a leading candidate for president in republican national convention, 1888; one term commander-in-chief of G. A. R.; secretary of war of United States, 1897–99, resigned; appointed United States senator, 1902, to succeed James McMillan, deceased, and was elected for term 1903–07. Author: Introduction to the Poetry of the Orient, Friendships of Women, and several books on ecclesiastical subjects. Died, 1905.

Ali Pasha (ä'-lē pä-shä') was born at Tepeleni, in Albania, in 1741. It is said that, having accidentally discovered a chest of gold, he raised an army of two thousand men, gained his first victory, and entered Tepelen in triumph. He acquired a high reputation as a soldier, and did such good service for the Turks in their Austro-Russian war of 1787 that he was named pasha of Trikala in Thessaly. It must be admitted that as a ruler he displayed many excellent qualities. He swept his old friends, the robbers, from the mountain roads, incorporated them into military troops, quelled the wretched factions that prevailed, and everywhere introduced order in the place of anarchy. Put to death, 1822.

Alison, Sir Archibald, lawyer and historian, was born at Kenley, England, in 1792. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1814, and occupied subsequently prominent legal positions. He was a writer on law, politics, and literature. His chief work, however, is The History of Europe During the French Revolution, which was exceedingly popular. It passed through many editions, and was translated into several languages, including Arabic and Hindustani. It was subsequently continued to the accession of Louis Napoleon. He was created a baronet in 1852, and died near Glasgow, Scotland, in 1867.

Allegri (ăl-lā'-grē), Gregorio, musical composer, was born at Rome about 1584. He studied under Nanini, and was a friend of Palestrina. He composed motets and sacred pieces; was appointed to the choir of the Sistine chapel, Rome, by Urban VIII., remaining until his death. He was one of the earliest composers for stringed instruments; but his most celebrated work is the Miserere, still annually rendered in the Sistine chapel. Died, 1652.

Marion Crawford and Lorimer Stoddard; starred, 1902, as Roma in Hall Caine's The Eternal City. In 1903, under management of her brother, began series of Shakespearean revivals, producing first Twelfth Night, in which she played Viola with success; in subsequent seasons she appeared as Hermione and Perdita in A Winter's Tale, also in As You Like It and The School for Scandal.

Allibone (ăl'ĭ-bōn), Samuel Austin, compiler of A Critical Dictionary of English Literature and British and American Authors, Living and Deceased, from the Earliest Accounts to the Middle of the Nineteenth Century, and other valuable works of reference; also contributor to periodical literature. He was born at Philadelphia in 1816, and died in 1889.

Allison, William Boyd, lawyer, American legislator, was born in Ohio, 1829; educated at Western Reserve college and practiced law until 1857; emigrated to Iowa; served in the civil war; was sent to congress while that struggle was going on, and remained in congress as representative and senator from that time until his death in 1908, save in 1872-73. His influence was marked and salutary on the legislation of his day.

Allston, Washington, American painter, was born in South Carolina, in 1779; graduated at Harvard in 1800, and went the next year to London to study art. In 1804 he went to Paris, and in 1805 to Rome, where he formed a close intimacy with Thorwaldsen and Coleridge. Elected an A. R. A. in 1819, he had the year before returned finally to America, and fixed his residence at Cambridge, Mass., where he died in 1843. His pictures are very numerous, the best being scriptural subjects. He is author of a poem, The Sylphs of the Seasons, the art-novel, Monaldi, and Lectures on Art.

He settled in England in 1873, where his pictures found a ready welcome. He was elected A. R. A. in 1876, and R. A. in 1879. Among his numerous works are "Phidias and the Elgin Marbles," "A Roman Emperor," "The Sculpture Gallery," "The Roses of Heliogabalus," "Clothilde at the Tomb of her Grandchildren," "The Education of the Children of Clovis," "How the Egyptians Amused Themselves 3,000 Years Ago," "Tarquinius Superbus," "Pyrrhic Dance," "The Vintage," "The Woman of Amphissa," "The Conversion of Paula," and "Thermæ Antonianæ." Died, 1912.

Almqvist (ălm'-kvĭst), Karl Jonas Ludvig, Swedish author, was born at Stockholm in 1793, and died at Bremen in 1866. He had a very erratic career; was once convicted of forgery and charged with murder; fled from Sweden to the United States, becoming for a time private secretary of President Lincoln. His romances, as a whole, are considered the best in the Swedish language. The Book of the Thorn-Rose is regarded as the best.

Alstroemer (ăl'-strē-mẽr), Jonas, Swedish industrial reformer, was born in 1685, and is noted for the great commercial improvements which he introduced into his native country. Of very humble origin, he was for a time unable to surmount the obstacles which poverty placed in his path. He visited England, and, having minutely noticed the sources of its manufacturing prosperity, returned to Sweden, and obtained permission to establish a manufactory at Alingsaes, in West Gothland, his birthplace. So extensive and successful were the manufacturing and agricultural resources which he introduced that the state conferred on him a patent of nobility, made him chancellor of commerce, and erected a statue to his honor on the Stockholm exchange. Died, 1761.

Alva, Fernando Alvarez de Toledo, Duke of, Spanish governor of the Netherlands under

Philip II. of Spain, was born in 1508. He was notorious for the merciless manner in which he exercised his dictatorial power. Under his rule more than 18,000 persons were sent to the scaffold, and a revolt, headed by the prince of Orange, broke out, which, after nearly forty years of war, resulted in the independence of the provinces. Alva was recalled in 1573, but he was soon given the command of Portugal, which he quickly conquered. Though his pride and cruelty were excessive, he was undoubtedly one of the greatest generals of his age. Died, 1582.

Alvarado (äl-vä-rä'-dō), Alonzo, one of the Spanish conquerors of Mexico under Cortez and of Peru under Pizarro, was born at Burgos about 1490; he was defeated and made prisoner by the Incan leader, Almagro. He afterward joined De Castro, and was lieutenant-general of the armed force which suppressed the rebellion of Gonzalo Pizarro in 1548. Died, 1554.

Alvarado, Pedro d', Spanish cavalier, was born in Badajoz, 1485. He took part in the expedition and victories of Cortez, and was intrusted with the command of the city of Mexico, and afterward made governor of Guatemala and Honduras. He explored California, and was killed soon after his return in an expedition against Jalisco. Died, 1541.

He was educated at King's College school; Charterhouse; Trinity college, Cambridge, and holds the degrees M. A., LL. D., D. C. L. He became a barrister in 1868, and joined the southeastern circuit; appointed tubman and subsequently postman of court of exchequer; Q. C., 1878; Attorney-general, 1885-86, 1886–92, and 1895–1900; M. P. Isle of Wight, 1885–1900; master of the rolls, 1900. He was knighted in 1885, and created a baronet in 1899 and baron in 1900.

Alzog (ăl'-tsōĸ), Johann Baptist, Roman Catholic historian, was born at Ohlau, Silesia, 1808. He was professor of church history in the university of Freiburg, and wrote a Manual of General Church History, which is known in many languages. He was also the author of an Outline of Patrology, and in 1869 was a member of the commission on dogma which prepared the work for the vatican council. Died at Freiburg, Baden, 1878.

Ambrose (ăm'-brōz), St., a doctor in the Latin church of the fourth century, was born at Treves, Gaul, 340. Consecrated archbishop of Milan, 374. Ambrose was repeatedly, in the discharge of his duty to the Church, brought into direct conflict with the highest secular authority. He rebuked Valentinian, defied Maximus, and, after the massacre of Thessalonica, compelled the great Theodosius to a humiliating penance before admitting him to Christian communion. To him we owe the noble hymn, "Te Deum Laudamus." No father of the church has a wider fame. Died at Milan in 397.

Amerigo Vespucci (ä-mā-rē'-gō vĕs-pōōt'-chē). See Vespucci.

Ames (āmz), Fisher, American lawyer and politician, was born at Dedham, Mass., 1758. He was graduated from Harvard in 1774; began the practice of law in 1781; sat in the Massachusetts convention, and was afterward a member of congress, and famed for his eloquence. He retired from public life with Washington, and devoted himself to literary pursuits; was elected president of Harvard college in 1804, which he declined. Died, 1808.

Ames, James Barr, dean Harvard law school 1895–1910; born at Boston, Mass., 1846; graduate of Harvard, 1868; Harvard law school, 1872; LL. D., university of the city of New York, university of Wisconsin, 1898; university of Pennsylvania, 1899; Northwestern, 1903; Williams, Harvard, 1904. Taught in private school, Boston, 1868–69; tutor in French and German, Harvard, 1871-72; instructor in history, 1872-73; associate professor of law, 1873–77, professor of law after 1877, Harvard. Compiled collections of cases on torts, pleading, bills and notes, partnership, trusts, suretyship, admiralty and equity jurisdiction; author of numerous articles in Harvard Law Review and other law reviews. Died, 1910.

Ames, Joseph Sweetman, physicist, professor of physics and director physical laboratory at Johns Hopkins; was born at Manchester, Vt., 1864; graduated from Johns Hopkins in 1886; Ph. D., 1890. Author: Theory of Physics; Manual of Experiments in Physics; Elements of Physics; Free Expansion of Gases; Prismatic and Diffraction Spectra; Induction of Electric Currents; Text Book of General Physics. Editor-in-chief, Scientific Memoir series; assistant editor Astrophysical Journal; associate editor American Journal of Science.

Amherst (ăm'-ĕrst), Jeffrey, Lord, British general, was born at Riverhead, England, 1717. As major-general he served on the continent and in America, where he succeeded Abercrombie as commander-in-chief. Here he was remarkably successful, and, after many victories, Montreal surrendered and Newfoundland was recovered from the French. He was raised to the peerage in 1776, and was appointed field marshal in 1796. Died, 1797.

Ami, Henry M., assistant palæontologist, geological survey of Canada since 1882, was born at Belle Rivière, near Montreal, 1858; graduated from McGill university, B. A., 1882; M. A., 1885; D. Sc., Queen's, 1892; McGill, 1907; awarded the Bigsby medal by council of geological society of London, 1903; fellow of the geological societies of London, Switzerland, and America.

Amiel (ȧ-myĕl'), Henri Frédéric, scholar and poet, was born at Geneva, Switzerland, 1821, studied at Berlin, 1844–48, and, from 1849 until his death in 1881, was professor at the academy (university) of Geneva. He published some essays and poems; but his wide culture, critical power, and profound but melancholy speculation were first made known after his death by a selection from his Journal Intime.

Ampère (äɴ'-pâr'), André Marie, a distinguished mathematician and naturalist, was born at Lyons in 1775. In 1805, after he had been engaged for some time as private mathematical tutor at Lyons, he was called to Paris, where he distinguished himself as an able teacher in the polytechnic school, and began his career as an author by his essay on the Mathematical Theory of Chances. In 1814 he was elected a member of the academy of sciences; and in 1824 was appointed professor of experimental physics in the Collège de France. Died, 1836.

Amundsen (ä'-mŭn-sĕn), Roald, explorer, discoverer of the South Pole, was born in Borge, Norway, 1872. In 1897 became mate with Belgica antarctic expedition. In June, 1903, he sailed in the Gjōa and after two years located the North magnetic pole and the Northwest passage. In June, 1910, in Nansen's famous ship, the Fram, he led the Norwegian antarctic expedition which resulted in the discovery of the South Pole, December 14, 1911. Made a member of the French legion of honor in 1912. Received gold medal from the national geographic society in 1913. Has announced arctic cruise in 1914. Author: The Northwest Passage, The South Pole.

Amurath (ä-mōō-rät'), or Murad I., sultan of Turkey, was born about 1319. He succeeded his father, Orkhan, in 1360. He was the first to lead Turkish arms into Europe, and in 1361 took Adrianople, fixed there his residence, built a splendid mosque, and further adorned the city. Urban V. preached a crusade against him, but the venture was disastrous to the Christians. He lost his life in the battle of Kossovo, 1389.

Amurath, or Murad II., sultan of Turkey, was born about 1403. He succeeded Mohammed I. in 1422; took Salonika from the Venetians and opened the way for subjugating Greece, but was defeated by Hunniades in 1442, and obliged to make peace. The Hungarians renewed the war, and hastening from retirement he defeated them in the important battle of Varna, 1444, where Ladislas, king of Hungary, fell. He invaded Albania and the Peloponnesus, where George Castriot (Scanderbeg) defeated him, but retreated only to gain a great victory over his former adversary, Hunniades, at Kossovo, in 1448; was the first Ottoman emperor who caused bridges of great length to be built; in his reign poetry, jurisprudence, and theology began to flourish. Died of apoplexy at Adrianople, 1451.

Anacreon (ȧ-năk'-rē-ŏn), celebrated Greek lyric poet, was born at Teos in Ionia, about 563 B. C. He was patronized by Polycrates, the tyrant of Samos, and Hipparchus, the tyrant of Athens. He died at Abdera, about 478 B. C., suffocated by a grape-stone while in the act of drinking. His poems are chiefly devoted to the praises of love, pleasure, and wine.

Anastasius I. (ăn-ăs-tā'-shĭ-ŭs), emperor of the East, was born 430 at Dyrrachium, in Epirus, and proclaimed emperor at the age of sixty. He owed his elevation to Ariadne, widow of Zeno, whom he married. He suppressed the cruel and degrading spectacles where men fought with wild beasts, abolished the sale of offices, the tax on domestic animals, built a wall on the west side of Constantinople to defend it from the incursions of the barbarians, constructed aqueducts in the city of Hierapolis, made a harbor at Cæsarea, and restored the light-house at Alexandria. Died, 518.

Anaxagoras (ăn-ăks-ăg'-ō-rȧs), Greek philosopher of the Ionian school, was born at Clazomenæ about 500 B. C. He studied under Anaximenes, and, after traveling through all the known parts of the globe in search of knowledge, established himself at Athens, where he opened the first school of philosophy. Pericles, Socrates, and Euripides were among his pupils. He was condemned to die for alleged impiety, a sentence which was changed to exile, when he retired to Lampsacus, and there continued to teach philosophy until his death about 428 B. C.

Andersen, Hans Christian, novelist, poet, and writer of fairy tales, was born at Odense, in Funen, 1805. He early displayed a talent for poetry, and was known in his native place as "the comedy-writer." He was placed at an advanced school at the public expense, and began his academic education in 1828. He completed his Agnes and the Merman in Switzerland; one of his best works, The Improvisatore, a series of scenes depicted in a glowing style and full of poetic interest, was the fruit of a visit to Italy. In the end of 1840 he commenced a somewhat lengthened tour in Italy and the East, of which he gave an account in A Poet's Bazaar, 1842. In 1844 he visited the court of Denmark by special invitation, and in the following year received an annuity, which placed him in comfortable circumstances. His works have all been translated into German and English. His Dying Child has been translated into the language of Greenland. He died in 1875.

D., 1888; professor of Greek and modern languages, Albion academy, 1866; instructor in languages, 1869-75, professor of Scandinavian languages and literature, 1875-83, university of Wisconsin; United States minister to Denmark, 1885-89. Editor and publisher of Amerika since 1898. Author: Norse Mythology; Viking Tales of the North; America Not Discovered by Columbus; The Younger Edda; First Chapter of Norwegian Immigration, 1821-1840; also many translations of Norse books, and author of several works in Norwegian.

Andrássy (ŏn'-drȧ-shĭ), Count Gyula, Hungarian statesman, was born 1823, of an ancient and noble family; espoused the popular cause in the revolution of 1848; was condemned to death in 1849, but escaped and went into exile. In 1867, when the right of self-government was conceded to Hungary, he was appointed premier of the new Hungarian ministry. He filled many distinguished and important posts and positions. He was member of the Presburg diet in 1847-48; lord-lieutenant of the county of Zemplin, and Hungarian ambassador to Constantinople. He was member of the diet of 1861, and vice-president of the diet of 1865-66; minister of foreign affairs, 1871-79. Died, 1890.

André (ăn'-drā or ăn'-drĭ), John, British soldier, born in London, England, 1751; served in the war with America, and rose to the rank of major. He conducted the negotiations with Benedict Arnold for the betrayal of West Point, but, being discovered in disguise, was arrested and put to death as a spy. His remains lie in Westminster abbey, where a monument was erected to his memory. Executed, 1780.

Andrew, John Albion, statesman, "war governor," was born in Maine, 1818; died at Boston, 1867; graduate of Bowdoin in 1837. He was admitted to the Boston bar in 1840; practiced there twenty years, and was conspicuous in cases arising under the fugitive slave law. In 1860 he was a delegate in the national convention which nominated Lincoln for president, and was himself elected governor of Massachusetts. He foresaw the danger of civil war and took immediate steps to perfect the organization of the militia of his state. In 1861, and yearly until he insisted on retiring in 1866, he was reëlected governor, and was conspicuous for his friendly care of soldiers. He declined the offered presidency of Antioch college.

Andrews, Charles McLean, educator, historian, professor of American history, Yale, since 1910, born at Wethersfield, Conn., 1863; graduated at Trinity college, Conn., 1884, A. M., 1890; Ph. D. Johns Hopkins, 1889; professor of history, Bryn Mawr college, 1889-1907, Johns Hopkins university, 1907-10. Andros (ăn'-drŏs), Sir Edmund, was born at London, England, in 1637; died, 1714. He was governor of the colony of New York for eight years, beginning in 1674; subsequently he was governor of New England for three years. He was deposed by the colonies and then was made governor of Virginia for six years, where he founded William and Mary college. He was harsh, and ruled without any regard to the wishes of the colonists. This made him disliked, in spite of his acknowledged honesty and uprightness. His demand for the charter of Connecticut is famous. To get it, he went to Hartford with a band of soldiers. The general assembly kept him talking in their hall until night, when candles were lighted and the charter brought in a box and laid on the table. Suddenly the lights were blown out. They were quickly lighted again, but the charter was gone. For three years no one knew where it was, but, in 1789, when the new king, William III., had recalled Andros, the charter was carefully taken from the hollow of an oak tree, where it had been hastily put on the night it disappeared. This tree was known as the "charter oak."

Angelico (ăn-jĕl'-ē-kō), Fra, the name by which we best know the great friar-painter, Guido di Pietri, whose monastic name was Giovanni. He was born in 1387 at Vecchio in Tuscany. In 1407 he entered the Dominican monastery at Fiesole, in 1436 was transferred to Florence, and in 1445 was summoned by the pope to Rome, where he afterward chiefly resided until his death in 1455. His most important frescoes are those in the Florentine convent of San Marco (now a museum), at Orvieto, and in the Nicholas chapel of the vatican. Others were painted at Cortona and Fiesole. Of his easel pictures, the Louvre possesses a splendid example, "The Coronation of the Virgin," and the London national gallery a "Glory, or Christ," with 265 saints — both of which were originally at Fiesole. There are fine examples of his art in the Uffizi at Florence.

Angell (ān'-jĕl), James Burrill, educator, diplomat; born at Scituate, R. I., 1829; graduate of Brown university, 1849; professor modern languages and literature, Brown, 1853–60; editor Providence Journal, 1860–66; president university of Vermont, 1866–71; president university of Michigan, 1871–1909, president emeritus since 1909; United States minister to China, 1880-81, member Anglo-American international commission on Canadian fisheries, 1887; chairman Canadian-American commission on deep waterways from lakes to sea, 1896; appointed minister to Turkey, 1897, but resigned August, 1898. Author: Progress in International Law, The Higher Education.

Anglin (ăng'-glĭn), Margaret Mary, actress, was born at Ottawa, Canada, 1876; educated at Loretto abbey, Toronto, and convent of the Sacred Heart, Montreal; graduated from the Empire school of dramatic acting, New York, 1894. Made professional début in Shenandoah, New York, 1904; leading lady with James O'Neil, playing in The Courier of Lyons, Virginius, Hamlet, Monte Cristo, 1896-97; leading woman with E. H. Sothern, 1897-98, Richard Mansfield, 1898-99, and in Empire Theater stock company; starred in Zira, 1905 06; co-star with Henry Miller, in The Great Divide, 1906-07.

Angoulême (äɴ'-gōō'-lâm'), Louis Antoine de Bourbon, Duc d', eldest son of Charles X. of France, was born at Versailles, France, 1775. He retired from France along with his father after the revolution, and lived in various places, including Holyrood. In 1799 he married his cousin, Marie Therese, only daughter of Louis XVI., "the only man in the family," in the words of Napoleon. After the restoration, he made a feeble effort, as lieutenant-general of France, to oppose Napoleon on his return from Elba; in 1823 he led the French army of invasion into Spain. During the revolution of 1830 he accompanied his father into exile, and died at Görz in 1844.

Anna Comnena (kŏm-nē'-nd), a learned Byzantine princess, author of one of the most valuable works to be found in the collection of the Byzantine historians, was the daughter of the emperor Alexius I. (Comnenus), and was born 1083. She early displayed a fondness for literary pursuits, but was also habituated from her childhood to the intrigues of the court; during the last illness of her father she entered into a scheme, which her mother, the empress Irene, also favored, to induce him to disinherit his eldest surviving son, John, and to bestow the diadem on her. Failing in this she framed a conspiracy against the life of her brother in 1118. Her brother spared her life, but punished her by confiscation of her property, which, however, he soon afterward generously restored. Disappointed and ashamed, she withdrew from the court and sought enjoyment in literature. Died, 1148.

Anne of Austria, daughter of Philip III. of Spain, was born at Madrid in 1601, and in 1615 became the wife of Louis XIII. of France. The marriage was so far from being a happy one that the royal pair lived for twenty-three years in a state of virtual separation, a result due chiefly to the influence of Cardinal Richelieu, whose fixed determination to humble the house of Austria led him to spare no means for alienating the affections of Louis from his queen. On the death of the king, in 1643, Anne became queen-regent, and evinced her discernment by choosing as her minister Cardinal Mazarin, by whose able management the young king, Louis XIV., came, on attaining his majority, into possession of a throne firmly established on the ruins of contending parties. She died in 1666.

Anne of Beaujeu, daughter of Louis XI., was born about 1462; married Peter Beaujeu, duke of Bourbon, and constable of France. She acted as regent of the kingdom during the minority of her brother, Charles VIII. Died in 1522.

Anne of Brittany, daughter and heiress of Duke Francis II., was born at Nantes, France, in 1476. In 1491 she was united to Charles VIII., king of France, and governed the kingdom during the expedition of that prince to Italy. After his death she married Louis XII. in 1499, over whom she exercised great influence. She died at Blois in 1514.

Anne of Cleves, the fourth wife of Henry VIII., to whom she was married in 1540, was born at Cleves, Germany, 1515. She was the daughter of John, third duke of Cleves. The match was projected by Cromwell, and was partly the cause of that minister's ruin. Henry put her aside, settled on her a liberal annuity, with which she was well satisfied, and she spent the remainder of her days in England, where she died in 1557.

Anne, Queen of England, was the second daughter of King James II., by his first wife, Anne Hyde, and was born in London, England, in 1665. In 1683 she married Prince George, brother to the king of Denmark, by whom she had a numerous family of children, all of whom died young. Anne ascended the throne on March 8, 1702. She established a fund, known as "Queen Anne's bounty," for the augmentation of the livings of the poor clergy. During her reign, which was made illustrious by the military triumphs of the duke of Marlborough, Sir George Rooke and Sir Cloudesley Shovel conquered the fortress of Gibraltar, a possession which Spain has never been able to regain; and the legislative union of Scotland with England was effected. The glorious galaxy of writers, in almost every branch of learning, who flourished in her time, has caused it to be considered the Augustan age of British literature. She died in 1714.

Annunzio, Gabriele d'. See D'Annunzio, Gabriele.

Anselm of Canterbury, a scholastic philosopher, born at Piedmont, 1033, and died in 1109. He led at first a dissipated life, and wandered through France, disputing wherever he could find an adversary. Attracted by the reputation of Lafranc, he went in 1060 to study at the monastery of Bec, in Normandy. Three years later he became prior, and in 1078 abbot of this monastery, the most famous school of the eleventh century. Lafranc, who in the meantime had gone to England and become archbishop of Canterbury, died in 1089, and in 1093 Anselm was appointed his successor. He was distinguished both as a churchman and a philosopher. His numerous embroilments with William Rufus and Henry I., and the unbending spirit which he displayed in these, even when subjected to banishment, indicate the vigor and resoluteness of his character as much as his writings exhibit the depth and acuteness of his intellect.

Anson, Sir William Reynell, English jurist, was born at Walberton, Sussex, 1843; M. P. for Oxford university since 1899; trustee of the national portrait gallery since 1904; chancellor of the diocese of Oxford since 1899; warden of All Souls' college, Oxford, since 1881. He was educated at Eton and Balliol college, Oxford. Fellow of All Souls', 1867; barrister, 1869; bencher, Inner Temple, 1900; Vinerian reader in English law, 1874–81; unsuccessful candidate for West Staffordshire, 1880; warden of All Souls', 1881; fellow of Eton college, 1883; alderman, city of Oxford, 1892–96; chairman of quarter sessions for Oxfordshire, 1894; vice-chancellor of the university of Oxford, 1898-99; parliamentary secretary to the board of education, 1902–05. Publications: Principles of the English Law of Contract, Law and Custom of the Constitution.

Anthony of Padua, St., born at Lisbon, 1195, was at first an Augustinian monk, but in 1220 he entered the Franciscan order, and became one of the most active propagators. He preached in the south of France and upper Italy, and died at Padua in 1231. He was canonized by Gregory IX. in the following year. According to legend, he preached to the fishes when men refused to hear him; hence he is the patron of the lower animals, and is often represented as accompanied by a pig.

Anthony the Great, St., the founder of monastic institutions, was born, 251, near Heraclea, in upper Egypt. In 285, having sold all his property and given the proceeds to the poor, he withdrew into the desert whither a number of disciples were attracted by his reputation for sanctity; and thus was formed the first community of monks. He afterward went to Alexandria to seek the honor of martyrdom amid the persecutions there raging against the Christians; but as his life was spared, he again returned to the desert, and died at the great age of 105.

Anthony, Susan Brownell, reformer; born at Adams, Mass., 1820; educated at Battenville, N. Y., and 1837-38 at Friends' boarding school, West Philadelphia. Taught school from age of fifteen to thirty; aided in 1852 in organizing the first state woman's temperance society; active in anti-slavery and woman's rights work; organizer and secretary of women's national loyal league during civil war. After the war, was entirely devoted to the woman's suffrage movement; founded in 1868 The Revolution, exclusively woman's rights paper; managed it several years; in 1869 organized, with Mrs. Stanton, national woman suffrage association; joint author with Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Mrs. Matilda Joslyn Gage of The History of Woman Suffrage (3 vols.), and of volume iv. with Mrs. Ida Husted Harper; contributed to leading magazines and lectured in England and throughout the United States. Died, 1906.

Antigonus (ăn-tĭg'-ō-nŭs), Cyclops, or "one-eyed," a distinguished general of Alexander the Great, on whose death he became governor of Phrygia, Lycia, and Pamphylia, and, after defeating and slaying Eumenes, and waging other successful wars, assumed the title of king. His ambitious schemes united his rivals, and he was slain in battle of Ipsus. Died, 301 B. C.

Antiochus (ăn-tī'-ō-kŭs) III., surnamed the Great, was born about 238 B. C.; succeeded his father, Seleucus Callinicus, as king of Syria in 223 B. C., and was the most distinguished of the Seleucidæ. He failed to recover Parthia and Bactria, but waged war with success against Ptolemy Philopator, and though defeated at Raphia near Gaza, 217, he afterward obtained entire possession of Palestine and Coele-Syria, dowering therewith his daughter Cleopatra on her betrothal to the young king, Ptolemy of Egypt. He afterward became involved in war with the Romans, who had conquered Macedonia; but declined to invade Italy at the instigation of Hannibal, who had come to his court of refuge. He crossed over into Greece, but was defeated in 191 at Thermopylæ, and in 190 by Scipio at Magnesia. Peace was granted him only on condition of his yielding all his dominions east of Mount Taurus, and paying a heavy tribute. To raise the money, he attacked a rich temple in Elymais, when the people rose against him, and killed him in 187 B. C.

Antiochus IV., surnamed Epiphanes, became king of Syria in 175 B. C. He fought against Egypt and conquered a great part of it. He twice took Jerusalem; and, endeavoring there to establish the worship of Greek gods, excited the Jews to a successful insurrection under Mattathias and his heroic sons, the Maccabees. Died, 164 B. C.

Antipater (ăn-tĭp'-ȧ-tẽr). Of the many persons who bore this name in antiquity the most celebrated was one of the generals of King Philip of Macedon, born about 400 B. C. When Alexander led his troops into Asia he left Antipater, who, along with Parmenion, had endeavored to dissuade him from the expedition, as governor of Macedon. Antipater discharged the duties of this office with great ability, suppressing the insurrections in Thrace and Sparta; but Olympias, the mother of Alexander, who entertained a dislike to Antipater, prevailed on her son to appoint Craterus as regent of Macedonia. Alexander, prompted also, it is supposed, by his own jealousy of Antipater, consented, but died before the change was carried into effect, and, in spite of his enemies, Antipater was left to share with Craterus the government of Alexander's territories in Europe. He died 319 B. C.

Antipater of Idumea, father of Herod the Great; took part in the disputes between Hyrcanus II. and Aristobulus II. He assisted in placing Hyrcanus on the throne of Judæa 63 B. C., and contrived to get the power in his own hands. He was afterward appointed procurator of all Judæa. Died, 43 B. C.

Antoinette, Marie. See Marie Antoinette, Josèphe Jeanne.

Antonelli (ăn-tō-nĕl'-lē), Cardinal Giacomo, Roman prelate and statesman, was born in Italy in 1806, and died at Rome in 1876. He was raised to the cardinalate in 1847, and was for a time secretary of foreign affairs for the papal states. As a champion of the papal interest, he strenuously opposed the union of Italy, under Victor Emmanuel. He was chief adviser and prime minister of Pope Pius IX. and during the Italian revolution of 1848 he accompanied his holiness in his flight to the seaport of Gaeta.

Antoninus (ăn-tō-nī'-nŭs), Marcus Aurelius. See Marcus Aurelius Antoninus.

Antoninus Pius (Titus Aurelius Fulvus), Roman emperor, was born 86 A. D. The family of Antoninus was originally from Nemausus, now Nimes, in Gaul. He inherited great wealth, and early gave proof of excellent qualities. In 120 he was made consul; afterward was sent by Hadrian as proconsul into Asia, where the wisdom and gentleness of his rule won for him a higher reputation than had been enjoyed by any of his predecessors. In 138 he was adopted by the emperor Hadrian, in consequence of merit alone, and came to the throne in the same year. The reign of Antoninus was proverbially peaceful and happy. The persecution of Christians, which was continued during his reign, was partly stayed by his mild measures. He died at Lorium, Italy, in 161.

Antony, Mark, celebrated Roman general, was born at Rome in 83 B. C. He fought bravely as a soldier in Syria, Egypt, and in Gaul under Cæsar, whose firm friend he became. He took part in Cæsar's great victory of Pharsalia, and with him was made consul in 44 B. C. After Cæsar was killed, Antony, with Augustus and Lepidus, formed a government called the triumvirate, which defeated the republican army of Brutus and Cassius at Philippi. Some time after, Antony visited Greece and Asia, and met the fascinating Cleopatra, queen of Egypt. His love for her made him forget the provinces he was to govern. When at last he turned his attention to them, his rule was so despotic that Augustus sent a force against him, and defeated him in the naval battle of Actium, during the progress of which he was deserted by the Egyptian fleet. He took his own life in 30 B. C.

Aoki (ā'-ō-kē), Viscount Siuzo, diplomatist; was born at Choshu, Japan, 1844; studied in Berlin university, Germany, 1869–73; secretary Japanese legation at Berlin, 1873-74; Japanese minister to Germany, 1874-75 and 1892–96; minister to Great Britain, 1894; vice-minister for foreign affairs, Japan, 1886–89; minister for foreign affairs, 1889–91, 1898–1900; privy councillor 1900–06; ambassador to United States, 1906–08. Decorated with first-class order of the rising sun.

Apelles (ȧ-pĕl'-lēz), the most celebrated painter in ancient times, the son of Pythias, and probably born at Colophon, Asia Minor. He flourished in the latter part of the fourth century B. C., and he united the fine coloring of the Ionian with the accurate drawing of the Sicyonic school. During the time of Philip, Apelles visited Macedon, where he became the intimate friend of Alexander the Great. It was probably at the Macedonian court that the best days of Apelles were spent. The period of his death is not known. The most celebrated of his paintings were "Anadyomene," or "Venus Rising from the Sea," and similar subjects; but he cultivated the heroic as well as the graceful style. His ideal portrait of Alexander wielding a thunderbolt was highly esteemed, and preserved in the temple of Diana at Ephesus.

Apollodorus (ȧ-pŏl-ō-dō'-rŭs), a great architect of the second century, was born at Damascus. He worked at Rome for the emperor Trajan, and built the forum and column which bear that monarch's name, but his greatest work was a huge bridge over the Danube at its confluence with the Alt. He was banished and put to death by Hadrian.

Apollonius (ăp-ŏl-lō'-nĭ-ŭs) of Perga, in Asia Minor, called "the great geometer," lived in the second half of the third century, B. C. He was educated at Alexandria, and wrote a treatise on Conic Sections in eight books. He is generally considered one of the founders of the mathematical sciences.

Apollonius, called the Rhodian (Apollonius Rhodius), was born in Alexandria 230 B. C. He presided over an academy at Rhodes, was an eminent rhetorician, and wrote a poem, in four books, on the expedition of the Argonauts, and other poems.

Apollonius of Tyana, in Cappadocia, born about 3 B. C., was a zealous neo-Pythagorean teacher, who collected many disciples, traveled through a great part of Asia Minor, and ultimately made his way to India. On this journey he was introduced to the Magi at Babylon, and at the court of King Phraortes, in India, made the acquaintance of the notable Brahmins. When he returned his fame as a wise man was greatly increased; the people regarded him as a worker of miracles and a divine being, and princes were glad to entertain him. He was patronized by Vespasian, and followed him to Egypt. After travels in Spain, Italy, and Greece, he was accused of conspiring with Nerva against Domitian; ultimately he appears to have settled in Ephesus, where he taught until he died, nearly one hundred years old.

Apponyi (ŏp'-pō-nyē), Count Albert, royal Hungarian minister of public education since 1906, was born 1846, son of Count George Apponyi, late chief-justice of the kingdom of Hungary. He was educated at the college of the Jesuits at Ralksburg, and the universities of Vienna and Budapest. Member of the house of commons since 1872; speaker in the same, 1902–04; has spent almost his whole parliamentary career in opposition. He has written many articles on questions of Hungarian public law in Hungarian, French, German, English, and American magazines. He visited the United States in 1911.

Apponyi, Count George, Hungarian statesman, was born 1808. He was a member of the Presburg diet of 1843, and chancellor of Hungary in 1847, when he opposed the revolutionary movements then breaking out, and which caused his retirement. In 1859 he was made a member of the imperial council in Vienna, and was instrumental in bringing about the reconciliation between Austria and Hungary. He is classed among the ablest of European statesmen. Died, 1899.

Apuleius (ăp-ū-lē'-yŭs), a satirical writer of the second century, born at Numidia, Africa; studied at Carthage. He went to Athens, where he entered keenly upon the study of philosophy, displaying a special predilection for the Platonic school. He visited Italy, Asia, etc., and was initiated into numerous religious mysteries. The knowledge of the priestly fraternities which he thus acquired he made abundant use of afterward in his Golden Ass. He was so extremely popular that the senate of Carthage and other states erected statues in his honor.

Aquinas (ȧ-kwī'-nȧs), St. Thomas. See page 274.

Arabi Ahmed (ȧ-rä'-bē) ("Arabi Pasha"), leader of the military insurrection in Egypt in 1882, was born in Egypt about 1841. He was for twelve years a private soldier in the Egyptian army, then rose to be colonel, minister of war, and pasha. He proclaimed to his troops that he was inspired by the prophet to undertake a holy mission, the motto of which was, "Egypt for the Egyptians," and he thus became the leader of a great rebellion. A massacre by his forces at Alexandria followed. The English came to the help of the khedive, and their fleet bombarded and dismantled the forts at Alexandria. The war lasted but a few months, Arabi's army being entirely defeated at Tel-el-kebir, in 1882, by the English under General Wolseley. After his defeat Arabi was banished to Ceylon, but was permitted to return in 1901. Died, 1911.

Arago (ăr'-ȧ-gō), Dominique, celebrated French philosopher, was born at Estagel, France, 1786. In 1806 he was engaged with Biot in measuring an arc of meridian. His subsequent life was distinguished by an ardent and successful devotion to science. In 1816, with Gay-Lussac, he established the Annales de Chimie et de Physique, and confirmed the truth of the undulatory theory of light. In the same year he visited England. In 1818 appeared his Recueil d' Observations géodésiques, astronomiques, et physiques. In 1820 he made several important discoveries in electro-magnetism. He was also eminent as a liberal politician. He died in 1853.

Aratus (ă-rā'-tŭs) of Sicyon, Greek statesman, born at Sicyon, Greece, 271 B. C.; died 213 B. C. He liberated Sicyon from the tyrant Nicocles in 251. His great object was to unite the Greek states, and so form an independent nation. He is said to have been poisoned by Philip of Macedon.

Arbaces (är-bā'-sēz), one of the generals of Sardanapalus, and the founder in 876 B. C. of the Median empire. In conspiracy with a Chaldean priest who commanded the troops from Babylon, he revolted, gained the assistance of several prominent officers, and defeated Sardanapalus, who committed suicide. The dynasty of Arbaces lasted until 559 B. C., when Cyrus overthrew it.

Arbuthnot (är-bŭth'-nŏt or är'-bŭth-nŏt), John, British physician and wit, the much-loved friend of Swift and Pope, was born at Arbuthnot, Scotland, 1667. He studied at Aberdeen and University college, Oxford, but took his M. D. degree at St. Andrews, 1696. Settling in London, where before this he had taught mathematics, in 1697 he attracted notice by his examination of Dr. Woodward's account of the deluge. Accident called him into attendance on Prince George of Denmark; in 1705 he was appointed physician to the queen, and her death in 1714 was a severe blow to his prosperity. In 1715, along with Pope, he assisted Gay in Three Hours after Marriage, a farce. He pronounced the Harveian oration in 1727, and died 1735. Utterly careless of literary fame, Arbuthnot was the chief if not the sole author of the brilliant Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus, first published in Pope's works. He wrote, also, the celebrated History of John Bull.

Arc, Joan of. See Joan of Arc.

Archimedes (är-kĭ-mē'-dēz), the most celebrated mechanician of antiquity, was born in Syracuse, Sicily, about 287 B. C., and died 212 B. C. He is said to have visited Egypt in early life, and to have invented there several hydraulic machines, including the Archimedean screw, which he applied to drainage and irrigation. Vitruvius relates that he discovered the principle of specific gravity while pondering the means of detecting a supposed fraud in the debasement of a golden crown of King Hiero with silver, by observing that his body would displace its own bulk of water in a full bath tub, and ran home naked exclaiming, Eureka, eureka, "I have found it, I have found it." In his old age he defended Syracuse against the Romans under Marcellus with great mechanical skill, and was killed at its capture. His purely mathematical works show that he far excelled all who preceded him. The most celebrated are on the ratio of the sphere and cylinder, on the ratio of the circumference to a diameter, on spiral lines, and on the parabola.

Aretæus (ăr-ē-tē'-ŭs), a famous Greek physician of Cappadocia, flourished in the latter half of the first and in the beginning of the second century after Christ. He is considered to rank next to Hippocrates in the skill with which he treated diseases. His great work is divided into two parts. The first four books treat of the causes and symptoms of acute and chronic diseases, and the second of their cure.

Argand (är'-gäɴ', Eng. är'-gănd), Aimé, Swiss physician and chemist, was born in Geneva about the middle of the eighteenth century. He invented the "Argand lamp," which was brought out in England in 1782. The patent was also claimed by a Frenchman, Ambroise Lange, and finally taken out in France in their joint names, the priority of invention being conceded to Argand. The French revolution, however, deprived him of all profit from his patent. Died in Switzerland in 1803.

Argyll (är-gīl'), Archibald Campbell, Marquis of, was the descendant of Sir Colin Campbell of Lochow or Loch Awe, who was knighted in 1286. Archibald was born in 1598, and in 1619, his father having turned Catholic and quitted Scotland, became the sole potentate of all the broad lands of his line. In the general assembly at Glasgow in 1638 he openly took the side of the covenanters, and next year joined Leslie's encampment on Duns Law. In 1640 he marched with 4,000 men through Badenoch, Athole, Mar, and Angus, enforcing subjection to the Scottish parliament. Charles, on his visit to Scotland in 1641, created him marquis. In 1644 he dispersed the royalist forces under Huntly; but Montrose in 1645 annihilated his army at Inverlochy. He was strongly opposed to the king's execution; in 1651 he crowned Charles II. at Scone. After the defeat of Worcester he defended himself for nearly a year in his castle of Inveraray against Cromwell's troops; but in 1652 he submitted to the protector. At the restoration he was committed to the Tower, from there taken by sea to Leith in 1661, and beheaded. A gorgeous monument was erected to him in 1895 in St. Giles's cathedral.

Argyll, George John Douglas, eighth duke of, was born in 1823, and died in 1900. He held important offices in the English government, and was a liberal in politics. He also wrote valuable religious and scientific works, among them The Reign of Law, and Primeval Man. His eldest son, the marquis of Lorne, married Princess Louise, the fourth daughter of Queen Victoria.

This is the first instance of the marriage of a daughter of a reigning sovereign of England to a subject. The marquis succeeded to the dukedom on the death of his father.

Ariosto (ä-rē-ŏs'-tō), Ludovico, one of the greatest of Italian poets, born at Reggio 1474, died at Ferrara 1533. His imaginative powers were developed in early life. In 1503 he was introduced to the court of the cardinal Ippolito d'Este, who employed him in many negotiations. Here he produced his poem Orlando Furioso, which was published in Ferrara in 1516.

Ariovistus (ā-rĭ-ō-vĭs'-tŭs), a chief of the Marcomanni, a German tribe, who crossed the Rhine to aid the Sequani against the Ædui, and occupied a considerable territory in Gaul, but was finally defeated by Cæsar at Vesontium (Besançon), in 58 B. C.

Aristarchus (ăr-ĭs-tär'-kŭs) of Samos, an Alexandrian astronomer, flourished 280–264 B. C. He seems to have anticipated Copernicus, maintaining that the earth moves round the sun. He wrote a treatise on the magnitude and distance of the sun and moon.

Aristides (ăr-ĭs-tī'-dēz), surnamed "the just," was the son of Lysimachus. He was one of the ten leaders of the Athenians against the Persians at the battle of Marathon, 490 B. C. It had been arranged that each leader, or strategos, should hold the supreme command for one day; but Aristides, who saw the folly of this want of unity, induced his companions to give up their claims and make Miltiades commander-in-chief, which proved the means of winning the battle. In 477 B. C. he introduced a change of the constitution by which all citizens, without distinction of rank, were admitted to political offices. Died, 468 B.C.

Aristippus (ăr-ĭs-tĭp'-pŭs), the founder of the Cyrenaic school of philosophy among the Greeks, was the son of Artiades, a wealthy gentleman of Cyrene, in Africa, and was born in that city about 425 B. C. He was a pupil of Socrates.

Aristophanes (ăr-ĭs-tŏf'-ȧ-nēz), the most celebrated of the ancient Athenian writers of comedy, was contemporary with Socrates and Plato. He was born at Athens, probably about 444 B. C. He began writing when very young, and his first plays were brought out under another name, because he was not old enough to contend for the prize. He wrote, in all, fifty-four comedies, but only eleven have come down to us. The Knights and The Clouds are among his most admired pieces. Others are The Wasps, The Birds, and The Frogs. Aristophanes laughed at everything and everybody, especially at everything new. He liked old Athens, "as it had been in the days of the Persian wars," and thus failed to see the good in men like Socrates. One of his finest plays, The Clouds, is a satire against Socrates. His plays have in them specimens of the most beautiful and finished poetry. He died about 380 B. C.

Aristotle (ăr'-ĭs-tŏt-'l). See page 266.

Arisugawa (ä-rē-sōō-gä'-wȧ), Prince Takehito, member of Japanese supreme council of war, was born in 1862. He belongs to one of the four imperial families of Japan. Visited England when a naval cadet; was a midshipman for two years on H. M. S. Iron Duke; served in channel squadron; studied at naval college, Greenwich; commanded cruiser Matsushima throughout war, 1894-95; admiral superintendent of Yokosuka; represented Japan at diamond jubilee of Queen Victoria, of England, and again visited England in 1905.

Arius (ā'-rĭ-ŭs or ȧ-rī'-ŭs), founder of Arianism, was born in Libya about 256 A. D., was trained in Antioch, and became a presbyter in Alexandria. Here about 318 he maintained, against his bishop, that the Son was not co-equal or co-eternal with the Father, but only the first and highest of all finite beings, created out of nothing by an act of God's free-will. He secured the adherence of clergy and laity in Egypt, Syria, and Asia Minor, but was deposed and excommunicated in 321 by a synod of bishops at Alexandria. Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, absolved him, and in 323 convened another synod in Bithynia, which pronounced in his favor. He defended his views before the council of Nicæa, 325, but they were condemned. Died at Constantinople, 336.

Arkwright, Richard, Sir. See page 372.

Arminius (är-mĭn'-ĭ-ŭs), a German chieftain, prince of the Cherusci, was born about 18 B. C., and died by assassination in 21 A. D. He became a Roman citizen and served as a soldier in the Roman army. Coming home, he found the whole country stirred up by the cruelties of Varus, the Roman governor, and became the head of a conspiracy. He induced the Roman general to scatter his troops in small detachments, saying that it would keep better order among the Germans. News of the conspiracy caused Varus to march into the interior, but the scattered Roman troops were murdered, the main body was surrounded and killed almost to a man, Varus taking his own life. Rome was filled with shame. The emperor Augustus kept crying for days: "Varus, give me back my legions!" Germanicus marched against the Cherusci, but accomplished nothing. The next year he marched again with 80,000 men and a fleet; Arminius artfully led him into narrow passes, then, falling upon him, cut off his cavalry, almost destroyed four legions and forced him to retreat. The next year the undaunted Germanicus came with 100,000 men and 1,000 ships. On a plain, called "no-man's meadow," a great battle was fought. The Germans were beaten, but the next morning they compelled the Romans to retreat. From this time no Roman army ever marched beyond the Rhine, and Arminius is, therefore, justly called the "German liberator."

Arminius, Jacob, teacher of the system of Arminianism, born 1560, at Oudewater, a small town in Holland. He studied at the university of Leyden, attended the school of theology in Geneva, and later studied at Basel. He was ordained at Amsterdam in 1588, and soon became distinguished as a preacher. In 1589 he consented to answer a book which attacked the doctrine of Calvinism, and while preparing to do so embraced the doctrine which he was trying to refute. In 1603 he became professor in the university of Leyden, and received the degree of D. D., the first ever conferred by that institution. He was one of the most learned men of his age, a preacher of great popular power and an author of rare ability. He died in 1609.

Armour, Philip D., merchant, capitalist, head for many years of the great firm of Armour & Company, pork packers and dealers in dressed meats and provisions, was born at Stockbridge, N. Y., 1832, and died at Chicago in 1901. His fortune was largely made in the immense commission business he conducted in Chicago and elsewhere, and in railways. His wealth was estimated at his death at about forty millions. The chief object of his benevolence was the Armour institute of technology in Chicago, which was opened in 1893.

Armstrong, John, American soldier and writer, was born at Carlisle, Pa., 1758; died, 1843. He served in the revolutionary war, leaving the service with the rank of major. He wrote the Newburgh Letters, setting forth the hardships of the revolutionary soldiers in respect to pay. He was attorney-general of Pennsylvania; United States senator from New York, 1800–04; minister to France, 1804–10; brigadier-general in the war of 1812; and secretary of war, 1813-14. He was charged with inefficiency in consequence of the capture of Washington, and resigned in September, 1814. He published a History of the War of 1812, Memoirs of Montgomery and Wayne, a Review of Gen. Wilkinson's Memoirs, and partially prepared a history of the revolution.

Armstrong, Sir William George, noted for various mechanical inventions, especially in artillery and in water-power machinery, was born in 1810 at Newcastle, England. In 1840 he produced a much improved hydraulic engine, in 1842 an apparatus for producing electricity from steam, and in 1845 the hydraulic crane. He was elected an F. R. S. in 1846, and shortly afterward commenced the Elswick engine-works, Newcastle. This large establishment at first chiefly produced hydraulic cranes, engines, accumulators, and bridges, but was soon to be famous for its ordnance, and especially the Armstrong gun, whose essential feature is that the barrel is built up of successive coils of wrought-iron, and which in 1859 was recommended by the rifle-cannon committee. Armstrong offered to his government all his inventions. He was knighted in 1859, and in 1887 was created Baron Armstrong; in 1894 he purchased Bamborough castle, to convert it into a retreat for cultured poverty. He wrote Electric Movement. Died, 1900.

Arnauld (är'-nō'), Antoine, known as "the great Arnauld," French philosopher and Jansenist theologian, was born at Paris in 1612. Entering the Sorbonne he became a pupil of Lescot, the confessor of Cardinal Richelieu, and afterward bishop of Chartres. His published works number 100. He died at Brussels in 1694. In 1643 he published a work entitled De la Fréquente Communion, which was received in the most favorable manner.

Arndt (ärnt), Ernst Moritz, German poet and patriot, was born in the then Swedish island of Rügen, 1769. He received an excellent education at Stralsund, Greifswald, and Jena, with a view to the ministry; but in 1805, after traveling over a great part of Europe, he became professor of history at Greifswald. His Geschichte der Leibeigenschaft in Pommern und Rügen led to the abolition of serfdom; in his Geist der Zeit he attacked Napoleon with such boldness that, after Jena, he had to take refuge in Stockholm. Was ist des Deutschen Vaterland? and others of his fiery songs, did not a little to rouse the spirit of Germany. In 1818 he became professor of history in the new university of Bonn; but, aiming steadily at constitutional reforms, he was suspended in 1820 for participation in so-called "demagogic movements," and was not restored until 1840. He was elected a member of the German national assembly in 1848, but retired from it in 1849. Vigorous in mind and body, beloved and revered by the whole German people as "Father Arndt," he died at Bonn in 1860.

Arne (ärn), Thomas Augustine, composer, was born in London in 1710, and educated at Eton. His father, an upholsterer, intended him for the bar, but young Arne became skillful as a violinist, forming his style chiefly after Corelli; his zeal in the study of music induced his sister, Mrs. Cibber, to cultivate her excellent voice. He wrote for her a part in his first opera, Rosamond, which was performed with great success in 1733. Next followed his comic operetta, Tom Thumb, and afterward his Comus. He married a singer, Cecilia Young; after a successful visit to Ireland was engaged as composer to Drury Lane theater, and wrote many vocal pieces for the Vauxhall concerts. Rule Britannia, originally given in The Masque of Alfred, is his, as well as two oratorios and two operas, Eliza and Artaxerxes. He died in London in 1778.

Arnold, Benedict, an American general and traitor, was born in Connecticut, 1741. Joined Ethan Allen against Ticonderoga, and later succeeded Montgomery after the capture of Quebec, 1775, becoming a brigadier-general. Refused promotion by congress, and consented to remain in the army only at Washington's request. In command of Philadelphia, 1778-79, his actions were severely criticised, and he was courtmartialed and reprimanded. He secured command of West Point and entered into treasonable negotiations with Sir Henry Clinton for its betrayal. The capture of Major André exposed the plot, and Arnold fled at once. He became a brigadier-general in the British army and commanded several minor attacks during the last months of the war. He was pensioned by the English government, but despised and neglected by the English people, except the royal family. He was a soldier of remarkable daring and ability, but unscrupulous from his boyhood. Died in London, 1801.

Arnold, Bion Joseph, electrical engineer, inventor, was born at Casnovia, Mich., 1861; graduated from Hillsdale college, B. S., 1884, M. S., 1887; post-graduate course at Cornell, 1888-89; E. E., university of Nebraska, 1897. Chief designer, Iowa iron works, Dubuque, Iowa; later consulting engineer for Chicago office of the General electric company; since 1893 independent consulting engineer. Designer and builder intramural railway, World's Columbian exposition; consulting electrical engineer Chicago & Milwaukee electric railway; Chicago board of trade; Chicago, Burlington and Quincy railroad; Grand Trunk railway on electrification of St. Clair tunnel since 1905; consulting engineer Wisconsin state railway commission, 1905–07; devised plan for electrically operating trains of New York Central railroad in and out of New York, and member electric traction commissioners engaged in carrying on the work; member electric traction committee, Erie railroad, 1900–04; consulting engineer for city of Chicago to revise street railway systems of city, 1902; chief engineer rebuilding Chicago traction system at cost of $60,000,000, 1907, and chairman of board of supervising engineers of the same. President of the Arnold company. Inventor of combined direct-connected machines, a magnetic clutch, storage battery improvements, and new systems and devices for electric railways. President of American institution of electrical engineers, 1903-04.

Arnold, Sir Edwin, English author and journalist, was born in 1832; educated at King's college, London, and at Oxford; was appointed second master at King Edward VI.'s school at Birmingham; resigned this for position of principal in the Sanskrit college of Poona, British India. In 1861 he became connected with the London Telegraph; noted as the author of several books, among them Poets of Greece, etc., and later his well-known poem, The Light of Asia. Died, 1904.

Arnold, Matthew, English poet and critic, eldest son of Dr. Arnold of Rugby, was born in Middlesex, England, 1822; was educated at Winchester, Rugby, and Balliol college, Oxford. He was elected fellow of Oriel college in 1845, and in 1851, after having been for some time private secretary to Lord Lansdowne, he was appointed lay inspector of schools under the committee of council on education. His poetic activity was manifested in early life; for ten years, 1857–67, he held the chair of poetry at Oxford; among his productions may be noted his Newdigate prize poem Cromwell, The Strayed Reveller and a volume of New Poems published in 1869. As a critic he holds a very high place. His later works were chiefly theological, being attempts to grapple with the supernatural aspects of Christianity from a rationalistic standpoint. St. Paul and Protestantism, Literature and Dogma, and God and the Bible are among his writings. Died, 1888.

Arnold, Sarah Louise, educator, born at North Abington, Mass., 1859; graduated state normal school, Bridgewater, Mass., 1878; A. M., Tufts, 1902; taught in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Vermont, and New Hampshire; principal training school, Saratoga, N. Y., two years; supervisor schools, Minneapolis, seven years; supervisor of schools, Boston, 1895–1902; dean Simmons college since 1902. Author: Waymarks for Teachers; Stepping Stones to Literature; Reading: How to Teach It; The Mother Tongue.

Arnold, Thomas, educator and historian, was born in 1795, in the isle of Wight, and educated at Winchester, and Corpus Christi college, Oxford. In 1815 he became fellow of Oriel, obtaining in that year the chancellor's prize for the Latin and in 1817 for the English essay. After taking holy orders, he passed nine years at Laleham, near Staines, in literary occupations, and in preparing young men for the universities. Appointed head master of Rugby school in 1828, he raised that institution beyond all precedent, both by the remarkable success of his pupils and by the introduction of new branches of study into the Rugby course. He was of the Broad church school of thought, and a vigorous opponent of the tractarian movement. In 1841 he was appointed professor of modern history at Oxford. The best known of Dr. Arnold's works are his edition of Thucydides, his History of Rome (unfinished), and his sermons delivered in the chapel of Rugby school. Died, 1842.

Arnold of Winkelried, a Swiss of Unterwalden, who, according to tradition, made a way for his comrades into the enemies' ranks at Sempach, in 1386, by grasping an armful of Austrian spearheads and plunging them into his own bosom.

Arrhenius (ăr-rā'-nĭ-ŭs), Svante August, Swedish chemist, director of physico-chemical department, Nobel institute, since 1905, was born in 1859. In 1884 he received the degree of doctor of philosophy from the university of Upsala. In 1895 he was appointed professor of physics in Stockholm. His most important contributions are in physical chemistry, more particularly in the theory of solutions, although his study of comets has added greatly to our knowledge of that subject. Received Nobel prize for chemistry, 1903.

Arrian (ăr'-ĭ-an), or Flavius Arrianus, Greek historian, was born in Nicomedia, Bithynia, about 100 A. D. He is best known by his history of the campaigns of Alexander the Great, which, in imitation of Xenophon, he called the Anabasis of Alexander. The emperor Hadrian made him a Roman citizen and governor of Cappadocia in 136. When fifty years old he settled in his native city. Besides the Anabasis he wrote an account of a voyage in the Black sea, an account of India, and other works.

Artaxerxes I. (ăr-tăks-ûrk'-sēz), king of Persia, surnamed Longimanus, the second son of Xerxes, escaped from the conspiracy of Artaban and others, and ascended the throne in 465 B. C. His long reign, extending to 425, was marked by a decline of power. Died, 425 B. C.

Artaxerxes II., surnamed Mnemon, succeeded his father, Darius II., in 405 B. C. After gaining the victory over his brother, Cyrus, he became involved in a war with Sparta, which ended with Antalcidean treaty of peace. Died, 361 B. C.

Artaxerxes III., surnamed Ochus, was the son and successor of Artaxerxes II., and reigned in the true style of oriental despotism until 338 B. C. One of his most daring exploits took place in Egypt, where he caused the divine bull Apis to be slaughtered and cooked as ordinary beef. He was poisoned in 338 by his eunuch, Bagoas.

Artevelde (ăr-tĕ-vĕl'-dĕ), Jacob van, popular Flemish leader of the fourteenth century, was a brewer in Ghent. His wealth, eloquence, and talents made him the most prominent man on the side of the citizens in their struggles against Count Louis of Flanders. The people of Ghent made him commander of their forces, and he banished from the town all the nobles and friends of the count. His power was secure for ten years, but in 1335 he made a treaty with Edward III. of England, persuading him to assume the title of king of France. To strengthen this alliance, he tried to make Edward, the black prince, count of Flanders, when the people rose in rebellion and Artevelde was slain, 1345.

Asbury (ăz'-bĕr-ĭ), Francis, the first bishop of the Methodist Episcopal church ordained in America, was born in Staffordshire, England, 1745. At the age of fourteen, he was apprenticed to a mechanic; two years later he began work as a local preacher. Later he joined the itinerant ministry, and after three years of service was sent to America as a missionary. In 1772 he was appointed general assistant by John Wesley. He brought new life into the work, and at the outbreak of the revolution, when many other ministers returned to England, he kept on in his labors. At the end of the war, it was decided to found an independent Methodist Episcopal church for America, and he was ordained in 1784 as bishop by his colleagues who had already been ordained by Wesley in England. For more than thirty years he worked earnestly and successfully, and the wonderful progress of Methodism in America was largely due to his efforts and ability. He helped to lay the foundation of the first Methodist college in America, in 1785. He died in Virginia in 1816.

Ascham (ăs'-kam), Roger, English writer and classical scholar, was born in 1515 at Kirby Wiske, in Yorkshire. His reputation as a classical scholar brought him numerous pupils, and, there being at that time no Greek chair, he was appointed by Cambridge university to read lectures in the public schools. He wrote, in 1545, a treatise entitled Toxophilus, the pure English style of which, independently of its other merits, ranks it among the classical pieces of English literature. For this treatise, which was dedicated to Henry VIII., he was awarded a pension. In 1548 he became master of languages to Lady Elizabeth, afterward queen, and was subsequently appointed Latin secretary to Edward VI. and Queen Mary. After the death of Mary, Elizabeth retained him at court as secretary and tutor. Died, 1568.

Ashburton, Lord, Alexander Baring, English diplomat, was born in 1774, second son of the eminent merchant, Sir Francis Baring. Having been employed as special ambassador from England to the United States to settle the Northeastern boundary question that then threatened to involve the two countries in war, in August, 1842, he concluded the famous treaty called the Ashburton treaty, by which the frontier line between the state of Maine and Canada was definitely settled. He was created Baron Ashburton in 1835. Died, 1848.

Ashhurst, John, Jr., American surgeon, educator, and author, was born at Philadelphia, Pa., 1839; acting assistant surgeon of United States army, 1862–65; professor of clinical surgery in university of Pennsylvania, elected in 1877. Aspasia (ăs-pā'-shĭ-ȧ), a beautiful Athenian woman, said to have been a native of Miletus in Asia Minor. Socrates is said to have been one of her admirers. In order to marry her, Pericles repudiated his wife. An affront offered to Aspasia is said to have caused the Peloponnesian war.

Asquith (ăs'-kwĭth), Rt. Hon. Herbert Henry, prime minister of England, was born in 1852, and entered the British parliament in 1886. He was educated at Balliol college, Oxford, and was admitted to the bar, Lincoln's Inn, 1876. D. C. L., Oxford; LL. D., Edinburgh, Glasgow and Cambridge. In the course of the home rule debates, he rose rapidly to the first rank in the house. He was intrusted with the conduct of the disestablishment of the church of Wales bill in 1894. On the defeat of the Rosebery ministry in 1895, he resumed practice at the bar. He was one of the most effective speakers on the liberal side during 1903 on the education question and the war commission's report, and during 1903, 1904, and 1905, in opposition to Chamberlain's fiscal policy. Chancellor of the exchequer, 1905–08. On the death of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, 1908, he became prime minister and first lord of the treasury. Introduced minimum wage bill passed by British house of commons, 1912.

Astor, John Jacob, American merchant, founder of the American fur company, was born near Heidelberg, Germany, 1763. After spending some years in London he sailed to America in 1783, and soon invested his small capital in furs. By economy and industry he so increased his means that after six years he had acquired a fortune of $200,000. Although the increasing influence of the English fur companies in North America was unfavorable to his plans, he ventured to fit out two expeditions to Oregon, one by land and one by sea, the purpose of which was to open up regular commercial intercourse with the natives. After many mishaps his object was achieved in 1811, and the fur-trading station of Astoria was established. From this period, in spite of the war of 1812 and other temporary obstacles, his commercial connections extended over the entire globe, and his ships were found in every sea. He died in 1848, leaving property amounting to $20,000,000.

Astor, John Jacob, capitalist, great-grandson of John Jacob Astor, was born at Rhinebeck, N. Y., 1864; graduated at Harvard in 1888; traveled abroad, 1888–91; manager of the family estates, 1891-1912; in 1897 he built the Astoria hotel, New York, adjoining the Waldorf hotel, which was built by William Waldorf Astor, his cousin, the two now forming one building under the name of Waldorf-Astoria hotel, one of the largest and probably most costly hotels in the world. Was colonel, staff of Governor Levi P. Morton, and in May, 1898, commissioned lieutenant-colonel of United States volunteers; presented to the government a mountain battery for use in war against Spain, said to have cost over $100,000. After assisting Major-General Breckinridge, inspector-general of the United States army, in inspection of camp and troops at Chickamauga Park, Ga., assigned to duty on staff of Major-General Shafter, and served in Cuba in operations ending in surrender of Santiago. Invented a bicycle brake, a pneumatic road improver, and an improved turbine engine. Author: A Journey in Other Worlds, etc. Died, 1912.

Astor, William Waldorf, capitalist, author, was born in New York, 1848; son of John Jacob, second, and Charlotte Augusta (Gibbes) Astor; great-grandson of John Jacob, founder of the Astor fortune. Educated by private tutors, finishing in Europe; entered office of the Astor estate, 1871; succeeded his father, 1890, as head of the Astor family, with personal fortune estimated at about $100,000,000. Member of New York legislature, 1878–81; United States minister to Italy, 1882–85; removed to England, 1890; became owner Pall Mall Gazette, and Pall Mall Magazine, 1893. Author: Valentino, a Story of Rome; Sforza, an historical romance of the sixteenth century in Italy, etc. Has for many years lived in England.

Astyages (ăs-tī'-ȧ-jēz), last king of Media, son and successor of Cyaxares, born 595 B.C. According to Herodotus, Astyages gave his daughter, Mandane, in marriage to Cambyses, an eminent Persian. Led by a dream which gave him alarm, he sent Harpagus to destroy the child which was the fruit of the marriage. But the child was hidden away by a shepherd, and it was after many years that his existence was brought to the notice of Astyages, who easily discovered the boy's parentage. Astyages punished Harpagus for deceiving him, and Harpagus instigated Cyrus, the child now grown up, to lead a revolt, through which Astyages was made prisoner, and Cyrus took the scepter 549 B. C. Astyages was treated mildly, but kept a prisoner until his death.

Atahualpa (ä-tä-wäl'-pä), the last of the Incas of Peru, succeeded his father, Huayna Capac, in 1525, on the throne of Quito while his half-brother, Huascar, although the rightful heir, obtained only the kingdom of Peru. The two brothers engaged in a struggle for supremacy, in which Huascar was defeated. The Spaniards under Pizarro, taking advantage of these internal dissensions, invaded Peru, and by an act of deliberate perfidy obtained possession of the person of Atahualpa, and attempted to compel him to acknowledge the king of Spain as master, and to embrace the Christian religion. His refusal was made a pretext for a massacre, and the imprisonment of their king, whom the Spaniards induced to raise an enormous treasure in the hope of regaining his throne. After a mock trial, however, he was condemned and strangled in 1533.

Athanasius (ăth-ȧ-nā'-shĭ-ŭs), Saint, was born in Egypt about the year 296, entered the church at an early age, and was chosen bishop of Alexandria in 326. He is esteemed one of the most eminent among the ancient fathers of the church. He was a violent opponent of Arius; and his earnest advocacy of the Catholic faith, more particularly of the doctrine of the Trinity, subjected him to much persecution from the emperors Constantine and Julian, by both of whom he was several times exiled, but he finally closed his days in tranquillity in 373, in the forty-eighth year of his prelacy. His works are numerous, but consist chiefly of invectives against his enemies, and controversial treatises against Arianism. The more important of his writings are his Apologies; Two Books on the Incarnation; Conference with the Arians; The Life of St. Anthony; The Abridgment of the Holy Scriptures; Letters to Those that Lead a Monastic Life, and Letters to Serapion.

Athenagoras (ăth-ē-năg'-ō-rȧs), a Christian philosopher, born at Athens, who lived toward the close of the second century. His conversion to Christianity has been likened to that of St. Paul. Writing against the Christians, in order to render his attacks more formidable, he referred to the scriptures, and by reading them was converted to the true faith. His Discourse on the Resurrection of the Dead and his Apology for Christians were much admired.

Atherton, Gertrude Franklin, novelist, was born at San Francisco, California, 1858, the daughter of Thomas L. Horn. She was educated at St. Mary's Hall, Benicia, California; Sayre institute at Lexington, Kentucky; married George H. Bowen Atherton, deceased. Author: The Doomswoman; Before the Gringo Came; A Whirl Asunder; Patience Sparhawk and Her Times; His Fortunate Grace; American Wives and English Husbands; The Californians; A Daughter of the Vine; The Valiant Runaways; Senator North; The Aristocrats; The Conqueror; The Splendid Idle Forties, being a revised and enlarged edition of Before the Gringo Came; A Few of Hamilton's Letters; Mrs. Pendleton's Four-in-Hand; Rulers of Kings; The Bell in the Fog; The Traveling Thirds; Rezanov; Ancestors.

Atticus (ăt'-tĭ-kŭs) Herodes, Tiberius Claudius, a rich Athenian, born about 104 A. D. To a vast sum of money left him by his father, he added much more by marriage. He was educated by the best masters, devoting special attention to oratory, in which he greatly excelled. He was also a noted teacher of rhetoric, having for pupils Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus. From Aurelius he received the archonship of Athens and the consulate of Rome. His fame rests mainly upon immense expenditures for public purposes. In Athens he built a race-course of Pentelic marble, and a splendid theater. In Corinth he built a theater; in Delphi, a stadium; at Thermopylæ, hot-baths; at Canusium, in Italy, an aqueduct. He contemplated a canal across the isthmus of Corinth, but gave it up because Nero had tried and failed. He restored several of the partially ruined cities of Greece, where inscriptions testified the public gratitude to him. For some reasons the Athenians became his enemies, and he left the city for his villa near Marathon, where he died, 180 A. D.

Atticus, Titus Pomponius, born at Rome 109 B. C., was educated with Cicero and the younger Marius. In 85 B. C. he withdrew to Athens; and, after 65 B. C., when Sulla induced him to return to Rome, he still devoted himself chiefly to study and the pleasures of friendship. In 32 B. C. he was informed that a disorder from which he suffered was mortal, and died after five days of voluntary starvation. A man of large wealth, and an Epicurean in philosophy, he was intimately acquainted with both Greek and Roman literature, and his taste was so good that Cicero used to send him his works for revision. None of his own writings have been preserved, but we have 396 epistles addressed to him by Cicero, ranging from 68 to 44 B. C.

Attila (ăt'-ĭ-lȧ), king of the Huns, who lived in the fifth century. He styled himself "the scourge of God," and devastated Lombardy. The city of Venice was founded by those who fled before him. On his death, in 453, his body was buried in three coffins, made of gold, silver, and iron. The captives who dug his grave were put to death.

Atwood, George, British mathematician, was born in 1746; died in London, 1807. He was educated at Cambridge university, became tutor of Trinity college, Cambridge, and invented a machine to illustrate the relations of time, space, and velocity in the motion of a body falling under the action of gravity. It is now known as "Atwood's machine."

Atwood, Thomas, British composer, was born in 1765. He commenced his musical education in the choir of the Chapel Royal under Dr. Nares, and later studied under Mozart. In 1795 he was appointed organist of St. Paul's. He wrote coronation anthems for George IV. and William IV., and died in 1838.

Auber (ō'-bâr'), Daniel François Esprit, French composer of operas, was born at Caen, in Normandy, 1782. His father was a print-seller in Paris, and, being desirous that his son should devote himself to business, he sent him to London to acquire a knowledge of the trade. But his irresistible passion for music obtained the upper hand, and he became a pupil of Cherubini. His opera Masaniello is considered his best. Among his works are the well-known operas, Fra Diavolo, Le Domino Noir, Manon Lescaut, etc. In 1842, after the death of Cherubini, he was appointed director of the conservatory of music, Paris. Died, 1871.

Aubigné (ō'-bēn'-yā'), Jean Henri Merle d'. See Merle d'Aubigné.

Audubon (ô'-dŏŏ-bŏn), John James, celebrated American naturalist of French descent, was born near New Orleans, La., in 1780; from childhood devoted to natural history, but it was not until 1830 that the first of the four volumes of his great work, The Birds of America, appeared. This magnificent collection of plates, which was sold for $1,000 a copy, was quickly followed by explanatory letterpress under the title of American Ornithological Biography. Audubon also projected a similar work on the Quadrupeds of America, but much of this work was done by his sons, John and Victor. Died in New York, 1851.

Auenbrugger von Auenbrug (*ou'-en-brŏŏg-gĕr fŏn ou'-en-brŏŏ*ᴋ), Leopold, Austrian physician, was born in 1722. He originated the method of examining the lungs by percussion of the chest, and published the results of his investigations in a treatise which marks an epoch in the history of medicine. The work has been frequently translated. He also wrote on various forms of insanity. He died, 1809.

Auerbach (*ou'-ĕr-bä*ᴋ), Berthold, German author, was born at Nordstetten in 1812. Having abandoned the study of Jewish theology, he devoted his attention to literature. His first publications were Judaism and Modern Literature, and a translation of the works of Spinoza. In his Educated Citizen and Village Tales of the Black Forest he applied himself to the portraiture of real life, and succeeded well. By some his Auf der Höhe, "On the Heights," is regarded as his best novel. Many of his works have been translated into English, Swedish, and Dutch. Das Landhaus am Rhein, is known by the English title, The Castle on the Rhine. Died at Cannes, France, 1882.

Auersperg (*ou'-ĕrs-pĕr*ᴋ), von, Anton Alexander, famous Austrian statesman and poet, whose pen-name was "Anastasius Grün," was born at Laibach, Austria, in 1806. He was a member of the Frankfort parliament of 1848, and later of the Austrian Reichsrath. Among his works are The Last Knight, Ruins, Promenades of a Viennese Poet, Robin Hood, etc. Died at Gratz, 1876.

Augereau (ō zh'-rō'), Pierre François Charles, duke of Castiglione, marshal and peer of France, one of the most brilliant and intrepid of that band of general officers whom Napoleon gathered around himself, was born in 1757. In 1792 he volunteered in the French revolutionary army intended for the repulsion of the Spaniards. His services were so conspicuous that in less than three years he was made general of a division. He took an active part and gained much glory in the battles of Millesimo, Ceva, Lodi, Castiglione, Roveredo, Bassano. In 1797 he was appointed to the command of the army of the Rhine; but after a few months the directory made him commander of the 10th division at Perpignan. This post he resigned in 1799, when he was elected as deputy to the council of the five hundred. In 1800 he received the command of the army in Holland, and was active in several engagements. In 1804 he was made a marshal, and in the following year he commanded a division of the army which reduced the Vorarlberg. He was afterward engaged at Wetzlar, Jena, Eylau; also in Italy, Spain, Berlin, Bavaria, and Saxony. Died in La Houssaye, 1816.

Augustine (ô'-gŭs-tīn or ô-gŭs'-tĭn), Saint. See page 212.

Augustus, Caius Julius Cæsar Octavianus, Roman emperor, born 63 B. C., was the son of Caius Octavius and Atia, niece of Julius Cæsar, by whom he was adopted when but four years of age. He was in Epirus when Julius Cæsar was assassinated, but speedily returned to claim his inheritance. Connected with Antony and Lepidus, Octavianus shared the guilt which stains the name of the triumvirate. His colleagues put aside, at the age of thirty-six he became emperor, with the title of Augustus. His reign was fortunate, good laws were framed in it, and the arts flourished under his protection. He died 14 A. D. His death threw a shade of sorrow over the whole Roman world; the bereaved people erected temples and altars to his memory.

Aurelianus (ô-rē-lĭ-ăn'-us), Claudius or Lucius Domitius, emperor of Rome, was born in Pannonia, 212 A. D., the son of a peasant; entered the Roman army, his exploits in which attracted the notice of the emperors Valerian and Claudius, and on the death of the latter in 270 he was proclaimed emperor. His short reign was a series of brilliant victories: the Goths and Vandals were subdued, the Alemanni, who threatened Rome itself, were exterminated, Palmyra was sacked, and Tetricus, the ex-emperor of Gaul, Britain and Spain, and Zenobia, the renowned queen of the East, led captive in the splendid triumph of Aurelian. A formidable rebellion at home was crushed with terrible sternness, and the emperor's severity made him feared even by his friends, who, as they deemed in pure self-defense, conspired against him and put him to death 275 A. D.

Aurungzebe (ô'-rŭng-zĕb'), emperor of India, known as the Great Mogul, was born in 1618. The third son of Shah Jehan, he affected devotion in early life but subsequently, at the call of ambition, he deposed his father and put to death his two brothers and nephew. As emperor, his career was brilliant. He conquered Golconda, Visapour, and Bengal, and posed as "conqueror of the world." His sons disturbed his latter days by attempting to depose him. He died in 1707.

Ausonius (ô-sō'-nĭ-ŭs), Decimus Magnus, foremost Latin poet of the fourth century, was born at Bordeaux, Gaul, about 310 A. D. He was appointed by Valentinian tutor to his son Gratian; and he afterward held the offices of quæstor, prefect of Latium, and consul of Gaul. On the death of Gratian, Ausonius retired to his estate at Bordeaux, where he occupied himself with literature and rural pursuits until his death, 394. It is most probable that he was a Christian. His works include epigrams, poems on his deceased relatives and on his colleagues, epistles in verse and prose, and idylls.

Austen, Jane, English novelist; born in 1775, at Steventon, Hampshire, England, of which parish her father was rector. Her principal productions are Pride and Prejudice; Sense and Sensibility; Emma; Mansfield Park; Northanger Abbey; and Persuasion. They are distinguished for originality, naturalness, and fidelity of delineation, qualities in which the literature of her time was most deficient. Her family moved successively to Bath and Chawton. She died at Winchester in 1817, and was buried in the cathedral.

Austin, Alfred, English poet, novelist, and journalist; born at Headingley, near Leeds, 1835; took his degree at the university of London, 1853; admitted to the bar, 1857; has published The Season, a Satire; The Human Tragedy; Interludes; Savonarola; English Lyrics, and many other poems, plays, and various political papers; was special correspondent of The Standard in Franco-German war, and editor of The National Review, 1883–93; was made fifteenth poet laureate of England, succeeding Tennyson, 1896.

Austin, John, eminent English lawyer and legal writer, was born at Creeling Mill, Suffolk, England, 1790. He was professor of jurisprudence at the university of London from 1826 to 1832. He wrote Province of Jurisprudence Determined and Lectures on Jurisprudence. Died at Weybridge, Surrey, 1859.

Austin, Oscar Phelps, statistician, was born in Illinois. Has been reporter, editor, Washington correspondent for metropolitan dailies; professor commerce and statistics, George Washington university; made chief bureau of statistics, department of commerce and labor, May, 1898. Member of Cleveland city council, 1891-92; of Ohio senate, 1893–97; member of many historical and economic societies. Author: Elementary Physics; Elements of Natural Philosophy; Physical Technics; Teachers' Hand Book of Natural Philosophy; Elements of Chemistry; Teachers' Hand Book of Chemistry; Complete Chemistry; First Principles of Natural Philosophy; Words Correctly Spoken; Columbus and the Columbia Brigade; School Physics; First Lessons in Physical Science; School Chemistry; The Town Meeting; History of the United States and Its People, 16 vols.

Avicenna (ăv-ē-sĕn'-ȧ), properly Ibn Sina or, more fully, Abu Ali Al-Hossein Ibn Abdallah Ibn Sina, a famous Arabian philosopher and physician, whose authority for many centuries passed for indisputable; born 980, at Charmatain, a village near Bokhara. He was physician to several of the Samanide and Dilemite sovereigns, and also for some time vizier in Hamadan. Died, 1037.

Avogadro (ä-vō-gä'-drō), Amadeo, Italian chemist and physicist, was born at Turin, Italy, 1776; died there, 1856. Professor of physics at Turin; formulated his celebrated law concerning the atomic theory in 1811.

Ayeshah (ī'-ē-shȧ or ä'-ē-shȧ), the favorite wife of Mohammed, was born at Medina in 610 or 611 A. D. She was only nine years of age when she married the prophet. Although she bore no children to Mohammed she was so tenderly beloved by him that he was wont to say that she would be the first of his wives to whom the gates of paradise would be opened. It is stated by Mohammedan historians that to the charms of her beauty she added a knowledge of mathematics, rhetoric, and music. In his last illness Mohammed, by his request, was carried to her house and expired in her arms. After the prophet's death Ayeshah took active part in the plot which deprived Caliph Othman of his power and life, and headed a force to resist the accession of Ali. Died, 678.

Baber (bä'-bĕr) (Zehir-Eddin Mohammed), the first of the Great Moguls in India, a descendant of Timur, was born in 1483, and was barely twelve when he succeeded his father in the sovereignty of the countries lying between Samarkand and the Indus. Having made himself master of Kashgar, Kunduz, Kandahar, and Kabul, in 1526 he routed at Panipat the vast army of the Afghan emperor of Delhi, and entered the capital. Agra shortly after surrendered. Baber died in 1530.

Babeuf (bȧ'-bĕf'), François Noel, French communist, was born about 1760 at St. Quentin, France; was a land surveyor at Roye in Picardy, when on the outbreak of the revolution in 1789 he attached himself to the most extreme party. As "Gracchus Babeuf," in his Tribun du Peuple, he advocated a rigorous system of communism; a secret conspiracy was formed, its aim the destruction of the directory and the establishment of an extreme democratic and communistic system. The plot was discovered, and Babeuf guillotined in 1797.

Bach (bäk), Johann Sebastian. See page 159.

Bach, Karl Philipp Emanuel, German composer, second son of Johann Sebastian, was born at Weimar in 1714; died at Hamburg in 1788. He was probably the most highly gifted of the eleven brothers, and his influence on the development of certain musical forms gives him a prominent place in the history of the art. He studied in the Thomas school, and afterward in the university of Leipzig, where jurisprudence was his preference. In 1738 he went to Berlin, and soon afterward was appointed chamber-musician to Frederick the Great. In 1767 he became chapel master at Hamburg, where he passed the remainder of his life. His most ambitious composition is the oratorio Israel in the Wilderness. His essay on The True Method of Harpsichord Playing was long a standard work.

Bache (bāch), Alexander Dallas, physicist, great-grandson of Benjamin Franklin, was born at Philadelphia, 1806. He was president of Girard college 1836–42, where he established a meteorological and magnetic observatory; superintendent of United States coast survey, 1843; regent of Smithsonian institution, 1846; president of the national academy of sciences, 1863. Baillie (bā'-lĭ), Joanna, Scotch poet and dramatist, was born 1762, in Bothwell manse. In 1784 she went to reside in London, and in 1806 took up her residence at Hampstead, where she remained until her death in 1851. No author has ever enjoyed a larger share than the "immortal Joanna" of the esteem and affection of her literary contemporaries. Her greatest achievement is undoubtedly the nine Plays on the Passions, which, though erroneous in conception, are full of impressive poetry, and often characterized by intense dramatic power. The most popular as well as the most powerful of them, the tragedy De Monfort, was brought out at Drury Lane, London, in 1800, Kemble and Mrs. Siddons taking the leading parts. Her Family Legend, produced at Edinburgh under Scott's auspices in 1810, was a great success.

Bailly (bȧ'-yĕ'), Jean Sylvain, French astronomer and politician, president of the national assembly of 1789, and mayor of Paris, was born, 1736. The revolution interrupted his studies and investigations in astronomy. During the earlier part of it he occupied a very prominent position. He was elected president of the national assembly, June 17, 1789, and mayor of Paris, July 15th. He was seized at Melun by the Jacobin soldiery, accused of being a royalist conspirator, condemned, and executed with the usual Jacobin preliminary of savage insult, 1793. He is best known by his great works on the history of astronomy.

Baily, Edward Hodges, English sculptor, and member of the royal academy, was born in Bristol, 1788; died in London, 1867. His works were much in request during his lifetime, and are still much admired. The statue of Nelson in Trafalgar square, London, and the bas-reliefs on the south side of the marble arch in Hyde Park are both the work of Baily. Among his finest pieces are: "Eve at the Fountain;" "Eve Listening to the Voice;" "Maternal Affection;" "Girl Preparing for the Bath," and "The Graces Seated."

He was actively engaged in the Mediterranean in successive command of the frigates George Washington, Essex, and Philadelphia, was once captured by the French, and had to surrender his ship in the Tripolitan war. In the war of 1812 he was given command of a squadron, consisting of the Constitution, Essex, and Hornet, which sailed from Boston in that year. When cruising off the coast of Brazil toward the close of 1812, he captured the British frigate, Java, for which congress voted him a gold medal, together with a share in the prize-money. During the remaining months of the war he had charge of the Charlestown navy-yard; and from 1815 to 1821 he was again in command of a squadron at sea. He was later stationed at Philadelphia, Boston, and other naval stations.

Baird, Sir David, British general, was born 1757, at Newbyth, Scotland. He entered the military service in 1772, and in 1779 sailed to India as captain in a Highland regiment. In July, 1780, Hyder Ali burst into the Carnatic at the head of 100,000 men, disciplined and commanded by French officers. A portion of the English army fell into an ambuscade and was cut to pieces; among the few prisoners was Baird, who endured a captivity of nearly four years at Seringapatam. In 1799 he was created a major-general, and led the storming column at the victorious assault of Seringapatam. He commanded an expedition sent from India to Egypt in 1801 to aid in the expulsion of the French, and marched across the desert to the Nile. Knighted in 1804, in 1805 he commanded an expedition against the Dutch settlements at the cape of Good Hope. In 1807 he commanded the first division at the bombardment of Copenhagen, and in 1808 was sent to Spain with 10,000 men to assist Sir John Moore. In the battle of Corunna, 1809, his left arm was shattered, and had to be amputated. Created a baronet, he retired from active service in 1810, and in 1820 was made commander of the forces in Ireland. He died at Fern-Tower, Crieff, 1829.

Balboa, Vasco Nunez de, Spanish conqueror, was born at Xeres-de-los-Caballeros in 1475. After leading rather a dissolute life in his youth, he took part in the great mercantile expedition of Rodrigo de Bastidas to the new world. He established himself in Santo Domingo, and began to cultivate the soil; but fortune proving adverse, in order to escape from his creditors, he had himself smuggled on board a ship, and joined the expedition to Darien in 1510, commanded by Francisco de Enciso. An insurrection which took place obtained for Balboa the supreme command in the new colony, but he was succeeded by Pedrarias Davila, by means of the intrigues of the Spanish court, and in a subordinate situation Balboa made several successful expeditions. Accounts reaching him of a great western ocean impelled him in 1513 to set out in quest of it. On September 25th of that year he obtained the first sight of the Pacific ocean from a mountain-top in the isthmus of Panama. He took possession of it in the name of his sovereign. He was executed in 1517 on the charge of a contemplated revolt.

Baldung (băl'-dŏŏng), Hans, called also Hans Grün, German painter and wood-engraver, contemporary of Albrecht Dürer, was born in Gmünd, Swabia, 1476; died at Strassburg, 1545. His masterpiece, a painting of the crucifixion, is in the cathedral of Freiburg; his wood-engravings are numerous.

Baldwin I., first Latin emperor of Constantinople, was born at Valenciennes in 1171. In 1200 he appointed his brother, Philip, and others to the regency of Hainault and Flanders, and joined the fourth crusade. Part of the crusaders — Baldwin among others — were induced to assist the Venetians in reconquering Zara, in Dalmatia, from the king of Hungary. While at Zara the young Alexis, son of Isaac II., emperor of Constantinople, asked the assistance of the crusaders against his uncle, Alexis Angelus, who, having deposed and blinded Isaac II., had usurped the throne. The crusaders soon defeated the usurper's forces and restored the rightful emperor; but Alexis having some difficulty in carrying out his promises, they turned their arms against him. Alexis Ducas Murzuphlus then usurped the throne, but was defeated by the crusaders and the city was sacked — the crusaders and Venetians sharing the booty. Baldwin was chosen emperor, and crowned in 1204; but he received only a fourth part of the empire — Constantinople and Thrace. He died in 1206.

In 1882 he and his single guide were killed on the Alps by slipping, while attempting to climb one of the spurs of Mont Blanc.

Baliol (bāl′-yŭl or băl′-yŭl), Edward, son of John Baliol, went to Scotland in 1332, and tried to win the kingdom from King David II., the son of Robert Bruce. With the aid of Edward III. of England, he defeated the Scotch, and was crowned king September 24, 1332. But most of the people did not want him, and after a reign of only three months he fled to England and died there in 1363.

Baliol, John, king of Scotland, was born in 1249. Through his mother he was connected with the royal family, and on the death of the heir to the throne, the "maid of Norway," he became a competitor for the throne with Robert Bruce. The question was left to Edward I. of England to decide. He chose John Baliol, who swore obedience to him as his feudal lord. In consequence of his oath, he soon found he had no real power. In 1295 he made a treaty with France, which was then at war with England. Immediately Edward invaded Scotland, and, taking Baliol prisoner, compelled him to give up his crown. In 1302 he was allowed to settle on his Norman estates, where he died in 1315.

Bartolommeo (bär′-tō-lōm-mē′-ō), Fra (properly Baccio della Porta), one of the most distinguished masters of the Florentine school of painting, was born near Florence in 1475. His first teacher was Cosimo Rosselli; but he owed his higher cultivation to the study of the works of Leonardo da Vinci. His subjects are mostly all religious, and by far the greater part of his pictures belong to the later years of his life. He was a warm adherent of Savonarola, after whose tragical end he in 1500 assumed the Dominican habit. The visit of the young Raphael to Florence in 1504 seems to have been instrumental in stimulating him to resume his art. He imparted to Raphael his knowledge of coloring, and acquired from him a more perfect knowledge of perspective. The two remained constant friends — Bartolommeo on one occasion finishing certain of Raphael's unfinished works, Raphael performing a like kindness for him at another time. Bartolommeo died at Florence in 1517.

Baumgarten (boum'-gär-ten), Alexander Gottlieb, the founder of the science of æsthetics, or the philosophy of the beautiful, was born at Berlin, 1714, studied at Halle under Wolf, and was appointed professor of philosophy at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, where he died, 1762. His Æsthetica, the work in which his special philosophy is developed, was published in two volumes, 1750–58. His Metaphysica is still highly esteemed.

Baumgärtner (boum'-gĕrt-nĕr), Karl Heinrich, German physiologist, was born in Baden, 1798, and died at Baden-Baden, 1886. From 1824 to 1862 he was professor of clinical medicine at Freiburg. He made important discoveries in embryology and physiology, and published works on the blood and nerves.

Baur (bour), Ferdinand Christian von, German theologian, born 1792, at Schmiden, near Stuttgart, was the founder of the Tübingen school of theology. His first important work was Symbolik und Mythologie, oder die Naturreligion des Alterthums. In 1826 he was called to the chair of Protestant theology at Tübingen, which he held until his death in 1860. The task he set before himself, and to which he devoted his life, was to supply, in a thoroughly free spirit, what was yet wanting for the comprehension of early Christian literature. Strauss had previously sought to show only what the gospels are not; Baur sought to discover what they are — to disclose the peculiarities of their structure, and to show how all the new testament writings grew out of contemporary circumstances.

Bax, Ernest Belfort, barrister-at-law, Middle Temple; author; born at Leamington, England, 1854; was educated privately in London and Germany; studied music, especially theory and composition; also later, philosophy, more particularly the German movement from Kant to Hegel; returning to England, was one of the founders of the English socialist movement. In 1885 helped to start the socialist league in conjunction with the late William Morris, and for some time co-edited with him the weekly journal Commonweal; subsequently resigned from league, and again became connected with the social democratic federation, coöperating on, and for a time editing, its organ Justice. Author: Jean-Paul Marat; Kant's Prolegomena, etc., with biography and introduction; Handbook to the History of Philosophy; Religion of Socialism; Ethics of Socialism; French Revolution; The Problem of Reality; Socialism, its Growth and Outcome (in conjunction with the late William Morris); Outspoken Essays on Social Subjects; The Peasants' War in Germany; Essays in Socialism, New and Old; The Roots of Reality; also edited the monthlies Time and To-day.

Bayard (bä'-yär'), Pierre Du Terrail Chevalier De, French knight, was born near Grenoble, in 1476. He served under Charles VIII., in an expedition against Naples, and in the wars against the English and Spaniards he distinguished himself by his bravery and nobleness of character. In the reign of Francis I., he gained a great victory for the king of Marignano, and defended the city of Mézières against Charles V., for which he was called the "saviour of his country." He was killed in a battle at the river Sesia, Italy, in 1524. He is known as "the knight without fear and without reproach."

Bayard, Thomas Francis, American statesman, was born at Wilmington, Del., 1828; died, 1898. He was privately educated and began the practice of law in his native city in 1851. In 1869 he succeeded his father as senator from Delaware, when he served continuously until 1885; entered Cleveland's cabinet as secretary of state in the latter year. In 1880 and 1884 he was candidate on the democratic ticket for the presidential nomination. In 1893 was appointed ambassador to England, the first to hold that rank as a representative of the United States.

Bayle (bĕl), Pierre, French skeptic and critic, was born at Carlat, 1647. He studied philosophy under the Jesuits at Toulouse, and for a year and a half turned Catholic. To escape ecclesiastical censure he withdrew to Geneva, and from there to Coppet, on the lake of Geneva, where he studied the philosophy of Descartes. After a few years he returned to France, and in 1675 was elected to the chair of philosophy at Sedan; in 1681 at Rotterdam. In 1684 he started Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, one of the most successful attempts at a popular journal of literary criticism. The revocation of the edict of Nantes led Bayle to write a strong defense of toleration. Bayle devoted his leisure to the Dictionnaire Historique et Critique. This, the first work published under his own name, exercised an immense influence over literature and philosophy, and was the dawn of scepticism of the eighteenth century. He died in 1706.

Bazaine (bä'-zĕn'), François Achille, a marshal of France; born at Versailles, 1811; distinguished himself in Algiers, the Crimea, and Mexico; did good service as commander of the army of the Rhine, in the Franco-German war, but after the surrender at Sedan was shut up in Metz, surrounded by the Germans, and obliged to surrender, with all his generals, officers, and men; was tried by court-martial, and condemned to death, but was imprisoned instead; made good his escape one evening to Madrid, where he lived to write a justification of his conduct, the sale of the book being prohibited in France. Died at Madrid 1888.

Bazard (bä'-zär'), Saint Amand, French socialist, born at Paris, 1791; in 1820 founded an association of French Carbonari, and in 1825 attached himself to the school of Saint Simon, he and Enfantin becoming its "pères suprêmes." But they quarreled over "free love," and during a heated discussion Bazard was struck with apoplexy. He died in 1832.

Was a teacher at St. Paul's school, Concord, Mass., one year; practiced law, Boston, 1888–92; assistant professor law, 1892–97, professor, 1897–1908, Carter professor general jurisprudence since 1908, Harvard; professor of law and dean of law school, university of Chicago, 1902–04. Author: Cases on Criminal Law; Cases on Damages; Cases on Carriers; Criminal Pleadings and Practice; Cases on the Conflict of Laws; Cases on Public Service Corporations; Foreign Corporations; Innkeepers; Railroad Rate Regulation (with Bruce Wyman); and various legal articles and monographs.

Beatrice Portinari (bē'-ă-trēs, or trĭs, pŏr'-tē-nä'-rē), Dante's poetical idol, daughter of a Florentine noble, remarkably graceful and accomplished. Dante first saw her when she was but nine years old, and but seldom afterward; but in his vivid imagination she grew to be the personification of divine truth, and so appears in the Divine Comedy. In 1287 she married a citizen of Florence. Born in 1266; died, 1290.

Beattie (bē'-tĭ), James, Scottish poet and writer on philosophy, born at Laurencekirk, Scotland, 1735; died, 1803. Professor of moral philosophy in Marischal college, Aberdeen, 1760–97. His writings include an Essay on the Nature and Immutability of Truth; The Elements of Moral Science; Dissertations, Moral and Critical; and Essays on Poetry and Music. His fame now rests almost wholly on The Minstrel, a descriptive poem on the progress of genius, written in the Spenserian stanza, and marked by great harmony of style, rich imagery, and delicate sentiment.

Beatty, John W., director of fine arts, Carnegie institute, Pittsburg, Pa., born at Pittsburg, 1851; student of Munich academy of fine arts; A. M., Western university of Pennsylvania, 1900; member jury on painting for Pennsylvania and New York, World's Columbian exposition, 1893; member national advisory board, Paris exposition, 1900, fine arts committee, Pan-American exposition, Buffalo, 1901, national advisory committee, Louisiana Purchase exposition, St. Louis, 1904; member of many art societies. Executed etching, "Return to Labor."

Beaufort (bū'-fĕrt), Henry, cardinal and bishop of Winchester, born about 1370; was half-brother to King Henry IV. He was educated in England and Germany, and in 1405 became bishop of Winchester. He was present at the council of Constance, and voted for the election of Pope Martin V., by whom he was subsequently made a cardinal. In 1431 he conducted the young king, Henry VI., to France, to be crowned in Paris as king of France and England. His memory is stained by his suspected participation in the murder of the earl of Gloucester and of the maid of Orleans. Died, 1447.

Beaufort, Margaret, countess of Richmond and Derby, was born 1441, died 1509. She was the daughter of the duke of Somerset, wife of the earl of Richmond (half-brother of Henry VI.), and by him mother of Henry VII. of England. She was afterward wife of Sir Henry Stafford, and of Thomas, Lord Stanley. She endowed Christ's and St. John's colleges in Cambridge, establishing a divinity school in each, but Henry VIII. recovered the property as her heir. She translated some devout works from the French.

Beauharnais (bō'-är'-nā'), Eugène de, viceroy of Italy during the reign of Napoleon I., and afterward duke of Leuchtenberg, and prince of Eichstadt, born 1781, the son of the vicomte Beauharnais. After his mother's marriage with Bonaparte, he accompanied him in his campaigns in Italy and in the expedition to Egypt. He rapidly rose to the highest military rank; and in 1805, after the erection of the imperial throne, he was made a prince of France and viceroy of Italy. His military talents were great, and were displayed particularly in the Italian campaigns, in the wars against Austria, and in the retreat from Moscow. The victory of Lützen was decided by his conduct in that battle. Napoleon sent him from Dresden to Italy, which he ably defended, even after Austria had joined the coalition, and Murat had deserted the cause of the French empire. Died, 1824.

Beauharnais, Hortense Eugénie de, daughter of Josephine; born in 1783; was married against her will to Louis, youngest brother of Napoleon Bonaparte, from whom she separated in 1810, after he was driven from the throne of Holland. Her son by him was Napoleon III. Died, 1837.

Beaumarchais (bō'-mär'-shā'), Pierre Augustin Caron de, French dramatist and poet, was the son of a watchmaker named Caron, and was born at Paris, 1732; married a widow, Madame Franquet in 1757, and from a little property of hers took the aristocratic name of Beaumarchais. In 1768 he married a second time, obtaining on this occasion a splendid fortune with his wife. Meanwhile devoting himself to literature, he produced Eugénie, a drama in five acts; Les Deux Amis, ou Le Négociant de Lyon; Le Barbier de Séville; and Le Mariage de Figaro. On these last two well-known productions his fame now rests. He lost largely by the publication of a complete edition of the works of Voltaire, for whose manuscripts he had paid 200,000 francs. He died in 1799.

Beaumont (bō'-mŏnt), Francis, English poet and dramatist, best known by his literary partnership with John Fletcher, was born at Grace Dieu, Leicestershire, in 1584; died, 1616. About 1607 he became acquainted with Fletcher, and so friendly did they become that they lived in the same house until Beaumont's marriage in 1613. A vague belief long prevailed that Beaumont wrote the graver and tragic, Fletcher the lighter and comic portions of their collaborated works. It seems, however, to be the general opinion that Beaumont's chief share lay in correcting the exuberance of Fletcher.

Beauregard (bō'-rē-gärd), Pierre Gustave Toutant, general of the army of the Confederate States during the civil war, was born near Orleans, La., 1818. At the secession of Louisiana he resigned his commission in the regular army; in 1861 he was appointed by the confederate government to the command at Charleston, S. C., where, on April 12-13th, he commenced the war by the bombardment of Fort Sumter; July 21st he won the battle of Bull Run; March 5, 1862, took command of the army of the Mississippi; was defeated April 7th at Pittsburg Landing; in 1863 defended Charleston, and aided in defense of Richmond; after the war he became a railroad president, and in 1878 adjutant general of Louisiana. Died, 1893.

Bebel (bā'-bĕl), Ferdinand August, German social democrat, was born at Cologne, 1840, and in 1860 removed to Leipzig, where in 1864 he established himself as a master turner. Entered politics in 1862; since 1871 has been a leader of the social-democratic movement in the Reichstag and in the press. He is an effective speaker and writer. Among his works are Der Deutsche Bauernkrieg; Die Frau und der Socialismus; Die Socialdemokratie; Charles Fourier; etc.

Beccaria (bĕk'-kä-rē'-ä), Cesare, Marchese, di, Italian economist and jurist, was born at Milan, 1735. Having formed his opinions by study of the French encyclopædists and Montesquieu, in 1764 he published anonymously his work on Crimes and Punishments, in which he argued against capital punishment and torture. The work was hailed with enthusiasm by the French school; commentaries were published by Voltaire and Diderot; and subsequent reforms have generally taken the direction it pointed out. Beccaria was among the first to advocate the beneficial influence of education in lessening crime. In 1768 he was appointed professor of political philosophy at Milan; in 1791 he was made a member of the board for the reform of the judicial code. He died of apoplexy in 1793.

Becher (bĕᴋ'-ĕr), Johann Joachim, German chemist, was born at Speyer in 1635, and lived successively at Mainz, Vienna, Munich, Würzburg, Haarlem, London, where he died in 1682. His Physica Subterranea was the first attempt made to bring physics and chemistry into close relation.

Beck, James M., lawyer, born at Philadelphia, Pa., 1861; graduate of Moravian college, Bethlehem, Pa., 1880; LL. D., Mühlenberg college, 1902; studied law and was admitted to bar, 1884; United States attorney for eastern district of Pennsylvania, 1896–1900; assistant attorney-general of United States, 1900–03. He has argued many important cases in United States supreme court, including the Neely case, and the lottery cases; argued the Northern Securities merger case before circuit judges. Spoke for the American bar at dinner given in the Temple, London, by the bench and bar of England. As master appointed by United States court sold, 1902, the Philadelphia Record for $3,000,000 — highest price ever brought by an American newspaper at public sale. In 1902 negotiated purchase of Philadelphia Ledger and the merging of it with Philadelphia Times; entered law firm of Shearman & Sterling, New York, 1903, and removed to that city; also member law firm of Beck & Robinson, Philadelphia.

Becker, Wilhelm Adolf, German author and philologist, was born at Dresden in 1796, died 1846. In 1837 was appointed professor of archæology at the university of Leipzig; in 1840 he traveled through Italy. His lively fancy, aided by a thorough knowledge of the classic languages, enabled him to make a novel use of antiquity. In his Charicles he ventured to reproduce the social life of old Greece, and in his Gallus to give sketches of the Augustan age at Rome. The learning which he has contrived to weave into his picturesque sentences is marvelous.

Becket, Thomas à, celebrated English prelate, the son of a merchant, was born at London in 1118; studied at Oxford, Paris, and Bologna, and on his return home entered the church. Henry II. made him high chancellor and preceptor to Prince Henry in 1155, admitted him to the closest intimacy and confidence, and in 1162 raised him to the archbishopric of Canterbury. Becket now entirely gave up his courtier habits, assumed a rigid austerity of manner, and became a stubborn champion of the exorbitant privileges of the clergy. A violent contest ensued between the sovereign and the prelate, and the latter was at length obliged to flee from the kingdom. In 1170, however, he was restored, and he instantly recommenced his resistance to the monarch. Irritated by this fresh disobedience, Henry uttered a hasty speech, which four of his knights not unnaturally construed into a command to rid him of the pertinacious archbishop. They accordingly hastened to England, and murdered Becket in Canterbury cathedral in 1170. He was canonized in 1172.

Beckford, William, an eccentric man of genius, was born at Fonthill, England, 1759. When he was about eleven years of age his father died, and he inherited estates in Jamaica, and Fonthill, in Wiltshire. His annual revenue is said to have exceeded $500,000. In 1783 he married Lady Margaret Gordon, daughter of Charles, fourth earl of Aboyne, and in the following year entered parliament. In the year 1787 he published Vathek in French. He informs us that he wrote this tale at twenty-two years of age, and that it was composed at one sitting. During all his life he was a hard-working student, but was of a most erratic disposition. Died, 1844.

Becquer (bā-kâr'), Gustavo Adolfo, Spanish poet and novelist, was born at Seville, 1836. His weird and fantastic tales are written after the manner of Poe and Heine, and have proved very popular. He left three volumes of poems and legends of which the best known is Leyendas españolas. Died at Madrid in 1870.

Becquerel (bĕk'-rĕl'), Antoine César, French physicist, born at Loiret, France, 1788. While studying the physical properties of yellow amber he had occasion to make experiments on the liberation of electricity by pressure; the result of his inquiries was the overthrow of Volta's theory of contact, and the construction by him of the first constant pile. He next discovered a method of determining the internal temperature of human and animal bodies, and by physiological applications demonstrated that when a muscle contracts there is a development of heat. He is, besides, one of the creators of electrochemistry, and invented a method of electrotyping. Died, 1878.

Beddoe, John, physician, anthropologist, born at Bewdley, England, 1826; was educated at Bridgnorth, University college, London, and Edinburgh university, graduating B. A., London, in 1851, and M. D., Edinburgh, in 1853. He served as a surgeon during the Crimean war, and afterward practiced at Clifton, 1857–91. He is the author of Stature and Bulk of Man; The Races of Britain; Anthropological History of Europe; Color and Race, etc. Died, 1911.

Bede (bēd), or Bæda (bē'-dä), surnamed "the venerable," English monk, scholar, and church historian, was born, 673, in the county of Durham, and died at Jarrow, at the monastery of St. Paul, in 735. He is said to have been the most learned Englishman of his day, and in the seclusion of his cell he wrote, besides his important Ecclesiastical History of England, which was translated from the Latin by King Alfred into Anglo-Saxon, a number of commentaries, homilies, hymns, and lives of the saints.

Bedford, John, Duke of, third son of Henry IV., was born 1389, died 1435; in 1403 was made governor of Berwick-upon-Tweed and warden of the west marches. In 1414 his brother, Henry V., created him duke of Bedford; and during the war with France he was appointed lieutenant of the kingdom. After Henry's death in 1422, Bedford became guardian of the kingdom, and regent also of France; and, Charles VI. dying two months afterward, he had his nephew proclaimed king of France and England as Henry VI. In the wars with the dauphin which followed, Bedford displayed great generalship and defeated the French at Verneuil in 1424. The appearance of Joan of Arc was followed by disaster to his arms; and in 1435 a treaty was negotiated at Rouen between Charles VII. and the duke of Burgundy, which ruined English interests in France. Bedford's death at Rouen was mainly occasioned by anxiety and vexation.

Beecher, Catherine Esther, eldest child of Lyman Beecher, was born at East Hampton, L. I., 1800. In 1822 she opened a school at Hartford, Conn., and ten years later a seminary for young women in Cincinnati, but was compelled to give it up on account of ill health two years afterward. She made it the business of her life to improve and advance the intellectual, physical, and practical education of women. She organized societies and schools for training teachers and sending them to new states and territories. In pursuit of this object she published Domestic Service, Duty of American Women to their Country, Domestic Receipt Book, True Remedy for the Wrongs of Women, Letters to the People on Health and Happiness, Physiology and Calisthenics, Religious Training of Children, The American Woman's Home, etc. She also published Common Sense applied to Religion, Truth Stranger than Fiction, a memoir of her brother George, and Appeal to the People as the Authorized Interpreters of the Bible. Died, 1878.

Beecher, Henry Ward, preacher, theologian, lecturer, orator, was born at Litchfield, Conn., 1813; graduated at Amherst college in 1834, studied theology under his father at Lane seminary, Cincinnati. After a pastorate of ten years in two churches in Indiana, he removed to Brooklyn and assumed charge of Plymouth church, "an organization of orthodox Congregational believers." He for many years drew one of the largest and most influential regular congregations in the United States, and his published sermons soon became a power in this and other countries. Owing to his rich fund of illustration, his impressive manner, and his keen sense of humor, his popularity as a pulpit orator and as a lecturer soon became recognized. His attitude during the agitation on the slavery question was emphatically that of an abolitionist; he visited Great Britain in 1863 with the avowed object of enlisting sympathy for the people of the North; and, although very unfavorably received at first, such was the force of his eloquence that he caused no inconsiderable change in public opinion. His reputation as a writer is second only to his celebrity as a preacher. For nearly twenty years he was editor of the New York Independent, and in 1870 he became editor of the Christian Union, also a religious weekly. His most important works are: Lectures to Young Men, Industry and Idleness, Life Thoughts, being selections from his extemporaneous sermons, revised by himself; The Star Papers, these last being composed of articles contributed to the New York Independent, and the Life of Christ. He also edited the Plymouth Collection of Hymns. Died at Brooklyn, N. Y., 1887.

Beecher, Lyman, preacher and theologian, was born at New Haven, Conn., 1775; graduated from Yale college, studied theology for a year, and began preaching at East Hampton, L. I., where he remained until 1810. He then went to Litchfield, Conn., where were born his two most famous children, Henry Ward and Harriet (Mrs. Stowe), though nearly all of his thirteen children are well known. He was one of the first pulpit orators of the time. After sixteen years he was called to Hanover Street church, Boston, and during his six years of hard work there engaged in a theological discussion with Dr. Channing. He spent twenty years at the head of Lane theological seminary, Cincinnati. Died at Brooklyn, N. Y., 1863.

Beers (bērz), Henry Augustin, author, professor of English literature at Yale since 1880; was born at Buffalo, N. Y., 1847; graduated from Yale, 1869. Author: A Century of American Literature; Odds and Ends (verse); Nathaniel Parker Willis; The Thankless Muse (verse); From Chaucer to Tennyson; Initial Studies in American Letters; A Suburban Pastoral and Other Tales; The Ways of Yale; A History of English Romanticism in the Eighteenth Century; A History of English Romanticism in the Nineteenth Century; Points at Issue; contributor to leading magazines.

Begas (bā'-gās), Karl, German painter, born at Heinsberg, near Aix-la-Chapelle, 1794; became a pupil of Gros at Paris in 1813; studied afterward at Rome, and was a member of the academy and court painter at Berlin from 1825 until his death in 1854. His pictures are partly biblical, partly romantic, and partly genre pieces. Of the first may be mentioned his "Baptism of Christ," in the style of the old Florentines, which was placed in the garrison church at Potsdam, and his fine fresco of Christ and the four evangelists surrounded by a choir of angels in the church of Cracow. Specimens of the other classes are the "Lorelei," "Girls under the Oak Tree," "The Vine Dressers," etc. He is chiefly memorable as a master of light and shade.

Begas, Reinhold, German sculptor, was born in Berlin, 1831; son of Karl Begas. Educated under Rauch and Wichmann, 1846–51; studied in Italy, 1856–58. Principal works: statue of Borussia for hall of glory; Neptune fountain on Schlossplatz; statue of Alexander von Humboldt, statue of Schiller for Gendarmen market, all in Berlin; sarcophagus of Emperor Frederick III. in Friedenskirche, Potsdam, and sarcophagus of Empress Frederick; national monument to Emperor William; statue of Bismarck before the Reichstag Gebaüde; several statues in the Siegesalle, Berlin. Died, 1911.

Behaim (bā'-hīm), or Behem (bā'-hĕm), Martin, German navigator and geographer, was born at Nuremberg about 1459, died about 1506; probably a pupil of Regiomontanus; visited Portugal about 1480, and in 1484 was made geographer of an expedition for the exploration of western Africa; knighted by John II. of Portugal. In 1492 he made a terrestrial globe, a gift to his native city, where it is still preserved.

Bekker (bĕk'-ĕr), Immanuel, German scholar and philologist, was born at Berlin, 1785; died there, 1871. He became professor of philology at Berlin, and edited critical editions of Plato, the Attic orators, Aristotle, Thucydides, Aristophanes, Herodotus, Livy, Tacitus, and other classic writers. His chief independent work was Anecdota Græca.

Belasco (bē-lăs'-kō), David, dramatic author, was born at San Francisco, 1859; educated at Lincoln college, California. Author: (plays) Zaza; The Heart of Maryland; The Wife; The Charity Ball; Lord Chumley; May Blossom; Men and Women; La Belle Russe; The Girl I Left Behind Me; Valerie; Hearts of Oak; The Darling of the Gods; Du Barry; Sweet Kitty Bellairs; Adrea; The Return of Peter Grimm. Manager of Mrs. Leslie Carter, David Warfield, and Blanche Bates.

Belisarius (bĕl'-ĭ-sā'-rĭ-ŭs), the great general of Justinian, was born in Illyria about 505. After commanding an expedition against the king of Persia about 530, he suppressed an insurrection at Constantinople, conquered Gelimer, king of the Vandals, and put an end to their dominion in Africa. In 535 he was sent to Italy to carry on war with the Goths, and took Rome in 536. He was afterward sent against the Persians and Huns, and in 563 was charged with conspiracy against Justinian, but was acquitted. That he was deprived of sight and reduced to beggary appears to be a fable of late invention. Died, 565.

D., Oxford university, 1907; went to Canada, 1870, and to Boston, 1871, becoming professor of vocal physiology, Boston university; invented telephone, for which patent was granted February 14, 1876; also invented photophone, induction balance, and telephone probe for painless detection of bullets in the human body, for which he was awarded hon. M. D. by the university of Heidelberg, Germany, at its five hundredth anniversary; with C. A. Bell and Sumner Taintor invented the graphophone, 1883. Regent Smithsonian institution. Officer French legion of honor; founder of Volta bureau. Member national academy of sciences and other scientific organizations. Author of many scientific and educational monographs, including Memoir on the Formation of a Deaf Variety of the Human Race.

Bell, Sir Charles, British physician and anatomist, famous for his discoveries in the nervous system, was born at Edinburgh, Scotland, 1774. In 1804 he proceeded to London, where he lectured with great success on anatomy and surgery. In 1807 he distinguished between the sensory and motor nerves in the brain. In 1812 he was appointed surgeon to the Middlesex hospital, which his clinical lectures raised to the highest repute. To study gunshot wounds, he went to Haslar hospital after Corunna in 1809, and after Waterloo took charge of a hospital at Brussels. In 1824 he became senior professor of anatomy and surgery to the royal college of surgeons, London, and in 1826 head of the new medical school, University college, but soon resigned. Knighted in 1831, and elected professor of surgery at university of Edinburgh in 1836; he died in 1842. His works include Anatomy of Expression in Painting; Anatomy of the Brain; Animal Mechanics; Nervous System of the Human Body, and The Hand.

Bell, Henry, who introduced steam-navigation into Europe, was born at Torphichen, Linlithgowshire, 1767. After acquiring a knowledge of mechanics in Scotland, he went to London and worked with the famous engineer, Rennie. In 1790 he returned to Scotland, and commenced business as a carpenter at Glasgow; removed to Helensburgh in 1808, and kept the principal inn there, but occupied himself with experiments in mechanics. In 1812 he launched the Comet on the Clyde, the first steam-vessel on European waters. The engine, at first of three-horse power, was afterward increased to six. He died at Helensburgh, 1830. At Dunglass, on the Clyde, a monument has been erected to his memory.

Bell, James Franklin, army officer, was born at Shelbyville, Ky., 1856; graduated from United states military academy, 1878; served on plains in 7th United States cavalry, 1878–94; captured band of half-breed Cree Indians near Ft. Bell, John, English sculptor, born in 1811, first exhibited in 1832, and has produced numerous admirable works in monumental, religious, and imaginative art. His "Babes in the Woods" and "Andromeda" were the chief attractions in the 1851 exhibition at London; while among his best-known statues are "Sir Robert Walpole," "Wellington," and the Guards' memorial. His last great work was the group "The United States Directing the Progress of America," for the base of the Prince Consort memorial, in London. Died, 1895.

Bell, John, American politician, was born near Nashville, Tenn., 1797; was admitted to the bar, 1816; member of congress from Tennessee, 1827–41; speaker of the house of representatives, 1834–35; secretary of war, 1841; United States senator, 1847–59; nominated by the constitutional union party for president, 1860, and received the electoral vote of Tennessee, Kentucky, and Virginia. He opposed Calhoun's project of nullification. Died, 1869.

Bell, Robert, chief geologist geological survey of Canada; acting director, 1901–06; was born at Toronto, Ontario, 1841; was educated at McGill and Edinburgh universities; D. Sc., McGill; LL. D., Queen's; F. R. S., 1897. Joined geological survey of Canada, 1857; has made very extensive topographical and geological surveys in nearly all parts of the Dominion since 1857. The Bell river or west branch of the Nottaway, which he surveyed in 1895, is officially named after him; was medical officer, naturalist, and geologist of Neptune expedition in 1884, and of Alert expedition in 1885 to Hudson's strait and bay; was also on the Diana expedition in 1897, when he surveyed the south coast of Baffinland and penetrated to the great lakes of the interior; has surveyed many Canadian rivers, and also made the first surveys of some of the largest lakes of Canada, including Great Slave, Nipigon, Seul, Osnaburgh, and parts of Athabasca, Winnipeg, and lake of the Woods; has been Canadian correspondent of the royal Scottish geographical society ever since its foundation, and a member of many scientific societies; was a royal commissioner on the mineral resources of Ontario, 1888–89; has published over 200 reports and papers, mostly on geology, biology, geography, and folk-lore; professor of chemistry and natural science in Queen's university, Kingston, 1863–67.

Bell, Thomas, naturalist, was born at Poole, Dorsetshire, England, 1792, and in 1813 entered Guy's hospital, where from 1817 until 1861 he held the post of dental surgeon and lectured on comparative anatomy. In 1836 he became professor of zoölogy in King's college, London; elected in 1828 a fellow of the royal society, and from 1848 to 1853 its secretary; also president of the Linnæan society, and first president of the Ray society. He wrote British Quadrupeds, British Reptiles, etc. Retiring from practice about 1860 to the wakes of Selborne, which he had purchased from Gilbert White's grandnieces, he died there in 1880.

Bellamy (bĕl'-ȧ-mĭ), Edward, American novelist and economist, born at Chicopee Falls, Mass., 1850. He was educated in Germany; admitted to the bar; was on the staff of the New York Evening Post in 1871-72; and on his return from the Sandwich islands in 1877 founded the Springfield News. He is best known by his novels Looking Backward, and Equality, both socialistic works. Died, 1898.

Bellarmine (bĕl'-lär-mĭn or mēn), Robert, celebrated Roman Catholic theologian; was born at Monte Pulciano, in Tuscany, 1542. He entered the order of Jesuits in 1560, and in his twenty-seventh year, when he went to Louvain as professor of theology, began that long controversy with "heretics" which formed the main business of his life. In 1599 he was made a cardinal against his own inclination. In 1602 he was appointed archbishop of Capua; after the death of Clement VIII., contrived to escape promotion to the papal chair, but was induced by Pius V. to take an important place in the vatican, where he remained until the time of his death, which took place in the novitiate-house of the Jesuits in 1621.

Bellew (bĕl'-ū), Harold Kyrle-Money, English actor; was born in Calcutta, 1857; son of Rev. J. C. M. Bellew, chaplain cathedral at Calcutta; was cadet in English navy, serving seven years, then went to Australian gold fields; worked on Melbourne newspapers; returned to England; made stage début at Theater Royal, Brighton; became leading man and star in London; came to United States as leading man in Wallack's theater, New York, October, 1885; subsequently starred jointly with Mrs. James Brown Potter, taking leading rôles with her in legitimate drama in all English-speaking countries. Bellini (bĕl-lē'-nē), Gentile, Venetian painter, was born about 1427, died 1507. He was employed with his brother, Giovanni, to decorate the great council-chamber of the Venetian senate-house. His most admired work is "The Preaching of St. Mark," in the college of that saint in Venice.

Bellini, Giovanni, Venetian painter, brother to Gentile Bellini, and with him the founder of the Venetian school of painting, was born 1426; died 1516. His best works are altar pieces. Among his more famous pictures are his "Infant Jesus," "Holy Virgin," and "Christ and the Woman of Samaria." There is a well-known picture of Bellini's, "Christ on the Mount," in the national gallery, London, and another, "The Circumcision," at Castle Howard. Among Bellini's many pupils the most distinguished were Giorgione and Titian.

Bellini, Vincenzo, Italian composer of operas, was born at Catania, in Sicily, in 1802. He was sent to the conservatoire of Naples, where he studied composition. After a number of early operas had made him known in Italy, he wrote, in 1827, the opera Il Pirata, which gave him a name in the musical world. He visited Paris and London, and died near Paris in 1835. Among his best works are Norma, I Puritani, and La Sonnambula.

Bellman (bĕl'-măn), Karl Mikael, Swedish poet, was born at Stockholm, 1740; became court-secretary in 1775, and died in 1795. His later and more brilliant pieces are chiefly bacchanalian, idyllic, or humorous songs, for which he also furnished original melodies. The best specimens of his genius, which is of a rare order, are to be found in the collections prepared by himself: Bachanaliske Ordenskapitlets Handbibliothek, Fredmans Epistlar, and Fredmans Sanger. A monument was erected to his memory at Stockholm in 1829, and ever since the anniversary of its erection has been kept as a popular holiday.

Belloc (bĕ-lŏk'), Hilaire Joseph Peter, English writer and politician, was born in 1870; graduated from Balliol college, Oxford, 1895. Author: Verses and Sonnets; The Bad Child's Book of Beasts; More Beasts for Worse Children; The Modern Traveler; The Moral Alphabet; Danton; Lambkins Remains; Paris; Robespierre; Path to Rome; Caliban's Guide to Letters; Avril; Mr. Burden; The Old Road; Esto Perpetua; Hills and the Sea; The Historic Thames; Cautionary Tales; On Nothing; Mr. Clutterbuck's Election. He was member of the house of commons, 1906-10.

Bellows, Henry Whitney, Unitarian divine and writer, was born at Boston, Mass., 1814; graduate of Harvard and of Cambridge divinity school; in 1838 became pastor of All Souls church, New York; was instrumental in establishing the Christian Enquirer in 1846; published a number of lectures and pamphlets, among the more notable his Phi Beta Kappa Oration, a Defense of the Drama, Treatment of Social Diseases, Christian Doctrine, The Old World in its New Face, etc. With an excellent literary taste and skill he combined practical and administrative ability. He did excellent service as presiding officer of the sanitary commission during the war of the rebellion. Died, 1882.

Bell-Smith, Frederic Marlett, artist; president of the Ontario society of artists; born at London, 1846; studied drawing at South Kensington, London; went to Canada, 1867; charter member society of Canadian artists, 1867; served in volunteers in suppressing Fenian invasion, 1870; director of fine arts, Alma college, since 1881; teacher of drawing, public schools, London, Ontario, 1882–89; director Toronto art school, 1889–91; lecturer and writer on art subjects. Bendemann (bĕn′-dē-män), Eduard, German painter of the Düsseldorf school, was born at Berlin in 1811. From 1859 until 1867 he was director of the Düsseldorf academy. His chief works are "The Lamentation of the Jews," in the museum at Cologne, and "Jeremiah on the Ruins of Babylon," in the national gallery, Berlin. He died in 1889.

Benedek (bā′-ne-dĕk), Ludwig von, Austrian general, born at Odenburg, in Hungary, 1804. After having served with great distinction in the campaign of 1848, against the Italians, in the war against the Hungarian patriots in 1849, and the war of Italian independence in 1859, he obtained in 1866 the command of the Austrian army against Prussia, and lost the decisive battle of Sadowa on July 3d. Died, 1881.

Benedict, Saint, one of the originators of monastic institutions in the West, was born at Nursia, in Italy, 480. Early in life he retired into a desert and spent three years in a cavern. Being discovered, his sanctity drew to him such numbers of people that he founded twelve convents. In 529 he went to Monte Cassino, built a monastery on the site of the temple of Apollo, gave rise to the Benedictine order, and died in 543.

Benedict XIII., Pope, son of the duke of Gravina, a Neapolitan nobleman, was born in 1649, and was raised to the papal chair in 1724. He was pious, virtuous, and liberal; but, unfortunately, placed too much confidence in Cardinal Coscia, his minister, who shamefully oppressed the people. A fruitless attempt which he made to reconcile the Roman, Greek, Lutheran, and Calvinist churches, bears testimony to his tolerant spirit. His theological works form three folio volumes. He died in 1730.

Benedict XIV., Prospero Lambertini, the most worthy to be remembered of all the pontiffs so named, was born at Bologna in 1675; began his pontificate with several wise and popular reforms; revived the academy of Bologna; executed several public works in Rome; caused the best English and French books to be translated into Italian, and in various ways gave encouragement to literature and science. Died, 1758.

Benedict, Sir Julius, German composer, was born at Stuttgart, Württemberg, 1804, died at London, 1885; studied under Weber. From 1835 on he resided in England; accompanied Jenny Lind to the United States in 1850. His operas include The Gipsey's Warning; The Brides of Venice; The Crusaders; The Lily of Killarney. He also wrote the cantatas Undine, Richard Cœur de Lion, and the oratorios St. Cecilia and St. Peter.

Beneke (bā′-ne-kē), Friedrich Eduard, German philosopher, was born at Berlin in 1798, studied there and at Halle, and in 1820 began to lecture at Berlin; his lectures were soon interdicted by the government as favoring Epicureanism. For three years he taught at Göttingen, but in 1827 his lectures at Berlin were again permitted, and in 1832, on Hegel's death, he was appointed extraordinary professor of philosophy. In 1854 he disappeared; in 1856 his body was found in the canal at Charlottenburg. His chief work was in empirical psychology.

Benjamin, Park, journalist and poet, was born at Demerara, British Guiana, 1809; graduated at Trinity college, Hartford; practiced law in Boston in 1832, and was an editor of the New England Magazine. In 1837 he removed to New York and became one of the editors of the American Monthly Magazine, and two years later assisted Horace Greeley in editing The New Yorker. In 1840 he was one of the editors of the New World, retiring in 1844. He wrote many poems, essays, reviews, etc. Died at New York in 1864.

Benjamin, Samuel Greene Wheeler, author, artist, was born at Argos, Greece, 1837; graduated from Williams college, 1859; assistant librarian New York state library, 1861–64; sent two companies of cavalry to war; served in hospitals; read law; studied art; at sea several years mastering seamanship; first United States minister to Persia, 1883–85; art editor, American department Magazine of Art, also New York Mail. Sent Crimean war marine drawings to London Illustrated News, 1854; opened studio in Boston as artist in oil and water colors, 1870. Author: Constantinople, Isle of Pearls and Other Poems; The Turk and the Greek; The Choice of Paris; A Romance of the Troad; Contemporary Art in Europe; What is Art? Art in America; World's Paradises; Troy, Its Legend, Literature and Topography; Persia and the Persians; The Story of Persia.

Bennett, James Gordon, American journalist; was born in Scotland in 1795 and died in 1872. He studied for the Roman Catholic priesthood but never took orders. In 1819 emigrated to America, and after having taught school in Halifax and been a proof-reader in Boston, became a journalist in New York; in 1825 purchased the Sunday Courier; subsequently, 1832, started the Globe, neither project succeeding. In 1835 he issued the first number of The Herald, a journal which, through his great ability and enterprise, soon commanded world-wide attention. His paper was the first to publish the stock lists and a daily financial review; many other original features were afterward added. When steam communication was opened with Europe, he crossed the Atlantic and made arrangements for correspondence from all countries. The first speech ever reported in full by the telegraph was sent to The Herald.

Bennett, James Gordon, journalist, capitalist, proprietor of New York Herald; was born in New York, 1841, son of journalist of same name; educated by private tutors; inherited The Herald and a large fortune in 1872; for a time issued a London edition and still publishes a Paris edition of The Herald; inaugurated publication in England of storm warnings transmitted from the United States; sent Henry M. Stanley to Africa to find Livingstone, 1874–77; fitted out Jeannette polar expedition, 1879; established in 1883 (with John W. Mackay) the Commercial (Mackay-Bennett) cable company; is a prominent yachtsman; lives most of his time in Paris, but keeps active management of The Herald by cable.

Benson, Edward White, English prelate and primate of all England, 1882–96, was born in 1829 and died in Flintshire, Wales, 1896; graduated at Trinity college, Cambridge; taught for a while at Rugby, was head master of Wellington college, chancellor of Lincoln cathedral, and in 1877 was consecrated bishop of Truro. In 1882, on the recommendation of Gladstone, the crown appointed him successor to Dr. Tait in the archbishopric of Canterbury. He held this high office in the church until his death. Author of The Seven Gifts, Christ and His Times, The Cathedral, its Necessary Place in the Life and Work of the Church.

Bentham, Jeremy, English writer on ethics and jurisprudence; born at London in 1748; admitted to the bar in 1772. Turning from the practice of law to its theory, he became the greatest critic of legislation and government in his day. In all his ethical and political writings the doctrine of utility is the leading and pervading principle; and his favorite vehicle for its expression is the phrase "the greatest happiness of the greatest number," which was first coined by Priestley, though its prominence in politics has been due to Bentham. He lived frugally, but with elegance, in one of his London houses, and, employing young men as secretaries, corresponded and wrote daily. He died in 1832.

Bentley, Richard, English classical scholar; born at Oulton, in Yorkshire, 1662. In 1676 entered St. John's college, Cambridge, and on leaving the university was appointed head-master of the grammar school of Spalding, Lincolnshire. He resigned this situation to become tutor to the son of Dr. Stillingfleet. Bentley accompanied his pupil to Oxford, where he was twice appointed to deliver the Boyle lectures on the evidences of natural and revealed religion. In 1690 he published his dissertation upon the epistles of Phalaris, which may be said to have commenced a new era in scholarship. In 1700 he was appointed master of Trinity college, Cambridge. Died, 1742.

Benton, Guy Potter, educator, president university of Vermont; was born at Kenton, Ohio, 1865; educated at Ohio normal university, Ohio Wesleyan university, Baker university, and university of Wooster; A. M., D. D., LL. D.; assistant state superintendent public instruction, Kansas, 1895-96; professor history and sociology, Baker university, 1896–99; president Upper Iowa university, 1899–1902; president Miami university, 1902-11. Lyceum lecturer on many subjects of an educational and inspirational nature.

Benton, Thomas Hart, American statesman, born in North Carolina in 1782, commenced legal practice at Nashville, Tenn., in 1811, and settled at St. Louis, Mo., in 1815; was elected United States senator in 1820, when he became a prominent supporter of General Jackson. Reëlected in 1826, he became a noted advocate of the gold and silver currency question, and supported Jackson in the latter's antagonism to the United States bank. He held a seat in congress for a period of thirty years, during which he voted for the annexation of Texas, and against the doctrines of nullification and state rights. He was author of A Thirty Years' View; or a History of the Working of the American Government for Thirty Years, from 1820 to 1850. Died, 1858.

Béranger (bā'-răN'-zhā'), Pierre Jean de, French lyric poet, born in Paris, 1780, was of humble parentage, and became apprenticed to a printer. In 1815 he began to bring out a collection of national and other songs, which created a powerful sensation, and, owing to many of them being satires upon the government, procured for their author a heavy fine and several months' imprisonment. His poems contributed in no small degree to the revolution of 1830. In 1833 a fifth series of his lyrics appeared, and in 1848 he was elected to the constituent assembly, but declined to serve. Died in 1857.

Beresford (bĕr'-ĕs-fĕrd), Lord Charles William de la Poer, British admiral, was born in Ireland, 1846; educated at Bayford school, Rev. Mr. Foster's, Stubbington, Fareham, Hants. Entered Britannia as cadet, 1859; sub-lieutenant, 1866; lieutenant, 1868; commander, 1875; captain, 1882; rear-admiral, 1897; naval A. D. C. to the queen, 1896-97; naval A. D. C. to the prince of Wales on his visit to India, 1875-76; M. P. Waterford, 1874–80; east division of Marylebone, 1885-89; M. P. York, 1897–1900; commanded Condor, bombardment Alexandria, 1882; landed at Alexandria after bombardment and instituted regular police system; served on Lord Wolseley's staff Nile expedition, 1884-85; and subsequently in command of naval brigade at battles of Abu Klea, Abu Kru, and Metemmeh; a lord commissioner of the admiralty, 1886; resigned 1888, on question of strength of fleet; visited China on a special mission, at request of associated chambers of commerce of Great Britain, 1898-99; rear-admiral, Mediterranean, 1900–02; M. P. Woolwich, 1902; commanded channel squadron, 1903–05; admiral, 1906; visited Canada, 1909. Author: Life of Nelson and his Times; numerous essays and articles on naval matters and Egypt; The Break-up of China.

Bergman (bĕrK'-măn), Torbern Olof, Swedish chemist and naturalist, was born at Katharinberg, Sweden, 1735; studied at Upsala, and in 1761 was appointed adjunct in mathematics and natural philosophy; professor of chemistry, 1766; wrote Physical Description of the Earth, On the Aerial Acid, and laid the basis of crystallography. Died, 1784.

Bériot (bā'-rē-ō'), Charles Auguste de, Belgian composer and violinist, born in Louvain, 1802. He was a precocious and original musician, remarkable for pure tone and refined taste. In 1836 he became the husband of the famous singer, Malibran. In 1842 he was made professor in the Brussels conservatoire, but resigned ten years after in consequence of failing eyesight. He was the author of a complete manual for the violin, and of a great number of popular compositions for that instrument. Died, 1870.

Berkeley, George, British divine and philosopher, and bishop of Cloyne, was born in Ireland in 1685. On his return from a visit to America he was raised to the episcopate. In philosophy he is an idealist, and his doctrines are the natural reaction against the prevalent materialism of his age. His most important works are the Principles of Human Knowledge, Minute Philosopher, and Theory of Vision. Died, 1753.

Berkeley, Sir William, governor of the colony of Virginia, was born at London, England, 1610. He was appointed governor of Virginia in 1641, but resigned in 1651, upon the accession of Cromwell. He remained in the colony, however, and in 1660 was chosen governor by the general assembly. Years later he lost the favor of the people by failing to protect them from the Indians, and a rebellion against him led by Nathaniel Bacon almost succeeded, but failed in consequence of the sudden death of the leader. Berkeley was recalled in 1676. He was the author of A Discourse and View of Virginia, and a drama called The Lost Lady. Died, 1677.

Berlichingen (bĕr'-lĭK-ĭng-en), Götz or Gottfried von, German knight, was born in 1480. He took part in the war of the peasants against the nobles, and was sentenced by Maximilian I. to pay a heavy fine. He was afterward mortally wounded in defending his castle against imperial troops. He wore an artificial hand which replaced one lost in battle, and was surnamed the "Iron Hand." Goethe made his achievements the subject of one of his best dramas. He died in 1562.

Berliner (bĕr-lē′-nĕr), Emile, inventor, was born at Hanover, Germany, 1851; educated public school, Hanover; Samson school, Wolfenbüttel. He came to the United States 1870, and pursued a mercantile career until 1878; began scientific experimental work, 1876; invented the loose contact telephone transmitter and use of induction coil connected therewith, 1877; discovered receiving action of loose contacts, 1877; the first 20,000 telephone transmitters ever used passed through his hands while chief instrument inspector of the Bell telephone company in Boston, 1879; invented the gramophone, 1887, the first talking-machine which utilized a groove of even depth and varying direction, and in which the record groove not only vibrates but also propels the reproducing stylus; also invented and perfected the present method of duplicating disc records; planned the milk conference of 1907 at Washington. He has published Conclusions dealing with philosophical and religious problems; also a number of scientific papers before societies and in literature.

Berlioz (bĕr′-lē-ōs′), Hector, French composer, of remarkable but eccentric genius, was born at La Côte St. André, 1803, and died in 1869. His best productions are the symphonies Harold and Romeo and Juliet. He was chief of the romantic school of music.

Bernard (bĕr′-nȧr′), Claude, French physiologist, born near Villefranche, 1813; studied medicine at Paris, and in 1841 became assistant at the Collège de France to Magendie, with whom he worked until his own appointment in 1854 to the chair of general physiology, and whom he succeeded in 1855 as professor of experimental physiology. He was elected to the academy in 1869, and died at Paris, 1878. His earliest researches were on the action of the secretions of the alimentary canal, the pancreatic juice, the connection between the liver and the nervous system, etc., for which he received prizes from the academy. Later researches were on the changes of temperature of the blood, the oxygen in arterial and in venous blood, the opium alkaloids, curarine, and the sympathetic nerves. His Leçons de Physiologie Expérimentale is still a standard work.

Bernard (bĕr′-nȧrd or bĕr-närd′), Saint, of Clairvaux, was born of a noble family at Fontaines, near Dijon, in Burgundy, 1091; in 1113 entered the Cistercian monastery of Citeaux, and in 1115 became the first abbot of the newly-founded monastery of Clairvaux, in Champagne, where he died, 1153. He was canonized in 1174. His studious, ascetic life and stirring eloquence made him the oracle of Christendom; he founded more than seventy monasteries; and the "mellifluous doctor" is regarded by the Catholic church as the last of the fathers. He drew up the statutes of the Knights Templars in 1128; secured the recognition of Pope Innocent II.; and it was his glowing eloquence at the council of Vezelay in 1146 that kindled the enthusiasm of France for the second crusade. The influence of St. Bernard as a spiritual teacher through his fervid piety and living grasp of Christian doctrine was a wholesome antidote to the dry and cold scholasticism of the age. Yet he showed a harsh severity toward Abélard and others whose views he disapproved. His writings consist of more than 400 epistles, 340 sermons, and twelve distinct theological treatises. He was one of the greatest of the Latin hymn-writers, many modern hymns being based on his Jesu Dulcis Memoria.

Bernardin de St. Pierre (bâr′-nâr′-dăɴ′ dē săɴ′-pyâr′), Jacques Henri, French writer, the admired author of Paul and Virginia, Studies of Nature, etc., was born at Havre in 1737. He was an engineer in Russia and France, 1767–71, settling in Paris the latter year. He then became professor of morals at the normal school and a member of the institute. Died, 1814.

Bernhardt, Rosine Sarah, famous French tragic actress, was born at Paris in 1845. Her parents were Jews, but she was educated in Grandchamp convent at Versailles. She made her first appearance on the stage in 1862, at the Théâtre Français, but at first attracted little notice. In 1867 her playing the part Marie de Neuberg in Victor Hugo's Ruy Blas made her famous. The war of 1870-71 interrupted her career, and for a while she became a nurse. She then won a position in the Théâtre Français, the troupe of which she accompanied in 1879 to London, where her triumphs were repeated in succeeding years, and where she married M. Damala, who died in 1889. She broke her contract with the Français in 1880, and has since been touring with great success in America, and in all the principal countries of Europe. She now directs a theater of her own in Paris. She is also a painter and sculptor. Her memoirs were published by Heinemann in 1907.

Bernini (bĕr-nē′-nē), Giovanni Lorenzo, known as the Cavalier Bernini, was born in Naples in 1598. He was eminent as a painter, an architect, and a sculptor; and his merit entitled him to the rewards which he had the good fortune to receive from Louis XIV. His "Apollo and Daphne," produced from a single block, when he was but eighteen years of age, was considered a masterpiece, but his finest works are found in the colonnade at Rome. He died in 1680.

Bernoulli (bĕr-nōō′-yē), Daniel, Swiss mathematician and physicist, was born at Groningen in 1700; died at Basel in 1782. He was the son of John, and like his father devoted himself to medicine as well as to mathematics. The family reputation early helped him to the professorship of mathematics at St. Petersburg, which he held for several years. From there, however, he went to Basel, much against the will of the czar. At Basel he occupied in succession the chairs of anatomy and botany, and of experimental and speculative philosophy. He published various works between 1730 and 1756.

Bernoulli, James B., was born at Basel in 1654, where he also died, 1705. He devoted his life to the study of mathematics of which he became professor in the university of Basel. Among his first works were A Method of Teaching Mathematics to the Blind, and Universal Tables on Dialling. These were followed by Conamen Novi Systematis Cometarum, an essay on comets, and an essay De Gravitate Ætheris. Among his triumphs are to be recorded his solution of Leibnitz's problem of the isochronous curve, his determination of the catenary, and investigation of the properties of isoperimetrical figures. At his request, a logarithmic spiral was engraved on his tomb, with the motto Eadem mutata resurgo.

Bernoulli, John B., brother of the preceding, was born at Basel, 1667. He and James were the first two foreigners honored by the academy of sciences at Paris. John devoted himself to chemical as well as to mathematical science. In 1694 he became a doctor of medicine, and soon after professor of mathematics at Groningen, whence he removed only to succeed his brother James in the university of Basel. His forte was pure mathematics, in which he had no superior in Europe in his day. He died in 1748. Among his achievements are the determination of the "line of swiftest descent," and the invention of the "exponential calculus."

Berosus (bĕr-ō′-sŭs), an eminent Babylonian historian, was born in the third century B. C.; was a priest in the temple of Belus, and wrote, in Greek, upon history and astronomy. His writings are said to have strongly corroborated various parts of scripture.

Bert (bâr), Paul, French physiologist and republican anti-religious statesman, was born at Auxerre, 1833, and died at Tongking, 1886. He was minister of public instruction in Gambetta's cabinet, 1881-82; governor-resident of Tonquin, 1886, and wrote extensively on both physiology and anatomy.

Berthelot (bĕr′t′-lō′), Pierre Eugène Marcellin, French chemist, was born at Paris, 1827, and in 1860 became professor of organic chemistry in the École de Pharmacie; in 1865 in the Collège de France; in 1876 inspector-general of higher education; in 1886-87 minister of public instruction, and in 1889 perpetual secretary of the Academie des Sciences. He did very important work in synthetic chemistry, and wrote a history of alchemy. In 1895-96 he was minister for foreign affairs. He died in 1907.

Berthier (bĕr′-tyā′), Louis Alexandre, prince of Neuchâtel and Wagram, and marshal of the French empire, was born at Versailles, 1753. He entered the army in 1770, and fought with Lafayette in the American revolutionary war. He accompanied Napoleon to Egypt as chief of the staff. In the revolution of 1799 he became war minister. Berthier was Napoleon's proxy in the marriage of Maria Louisa, at Vienna, 1810. In the campaigns of 1812, 1813, and 1814 he was constantly by the emperor's side, and acted both as chief of staff and as quartermaster-general. On the return of Napoleon from Elba he retired to Bamberg, in Bavaria, where his mind became deranged. Died, 1815.

Bertillon (bĕr′-tē′-yôɴ′), Alphonse, French anthropologist; head of identification department in the prefecture of police of Paris; born at Paris, 1853; founded his system of mensuration, known as the "Bertillon system," in 1880. Author: Ethnographie Moderne, les Races Sauvages, L'Anthropometrie Judiciarie a Paris en 1889; la Photographie Judiciaire; De la Reconstitution du Signalement Anthropometrique au moyen des Vetements; Identification Anthropometrique; La comparison des ecritures et l'identification graphique.

Berwick, James Fitz-James, Duke of, was born in 1670, at Moulins, France, and served with distinction in Hungary, Ireland, and Flanders. In 1704 he was commander-in-chief of the French troops in Spain; in the following year he was opposed to the Languedocian insurgents; and in 1706, being then a field marshal, was again at the head of the army in Spain and gained the battle of Almanza. In four subsequent campaigns he successfully defended Dauphiné against the attempts of the duke of Savoy. His last service in the succession war was the reduction of Barcelona. In 1734 he was placed at the head of the French army on the Rhine, and was killed at the siege of Philippsburg. He is the author of his own Memoirs.

Berzelius (bĕr-zē′-lĭ-ŭs), Jöns Jakob, Swedish chemist, was born at Westerlösa, in East Gothland, Sweden, 1779; died, 1848. He was perpetual secretary of the academy of sciences at Stockholm, and also a baron and senator of the kingdom, the former dignity having been granted to him in recognition of his scientific discoveries. He was the author of what is known as the dualistic (or binary) theory of the chemical constitution of compounds, and devised the form of symbolic notation now employed. He determined with great care and accuracy the combining weights of a number of elements, and thus placed Dalton's atomic theory on a firm quantitative basis. His reputation was world-wide, and his accurate investigations exerted very great influence on the development of scientific chemistry.

Besant (bĕz′-ant or bĕs′-ant), Annie, president British theosophical society; author and lecturer on religious, philosophical, and scientific subjects; was born in London in 1847; daughter of William Page Wood. She was educated privately in England, Germany, France. Joined the national secular society, 1874; worked in the free thought and radical movements led by Charles Bradlaugh, M. P.; was co-editor with him of the National Reformer; was a member of the London school board, 1887–90, but refused reëlection; joined the theosophical society in 1889, became a devoted pupil of Mme. Blavatsky, and has traveled to all parts of the globe in its service. Founded in 1898 the Central Hindu college at Benares; 1904, the Central Hindu girls' school, Benares; is working to found the university of India. Author: Reincarnation; Seven Principles of Man; Death and After; In the Outer Court; Karma; Man and His Bodies; Four Great Religions; The Ancient Wisdom; Three Paths to Union with God; Evolution of Life and Form; The Religious Problem in India; The Pedigree of Man; Theosophy and the New Psychology; The Wisdom of the Upanishats; editor of the Theosophist, and of the Central Hindu College Magazine.

Besant (bē-sănt′), Sir Walter, English novelist, was born at Portsmouth, England, 1836. He studied at King's college, London, and at Christ's college, Cambridge, and having abandoned the idea of taking orders, was appointed to a professorship in Mauritius. Ill-health compelling him to resign this post, he returned to England and devoted himself to literature. His first work, Studies in French Poetry, appeared in 1868; and in 1871 he entered into a literary partnership with James Rice, a native of Northampton, and editor of Once a Week. Together they produced Readymoney Mortiboy; My Little Girl; With Harp and Crown; This Son of Vulcan; The Golden Butterfly; The Monks of Thelema; By Celia's Arbour; The Chaplain of the Fleet, and The Seamy Side; thereafter Sir Walter wrote All Sorts and Conditions of Men; All in a Garden Fair; Dorothy Forster; Children of Gibeon; Armorel of Lyonesse; The Ivory Gate; Beyond the Dreams of Avarice; The Master Craftsman; etc. Knighted in 1895, he died in 1901.

Bessel (bĕs′-el), Friedrich Wilhelm, German astronomer, was born at Minden, Prussia, 1784, died at Königsberg, 1846. He attracted the attention of Olbers by his computation of the orbit of the comet of 1607 from observations which had just been discovered, and was offered the position of assistant in Schröter's observatory; appointed director of the new observatory at Königsberg, where the rest of his active life was passed. His Fundamenta Astronomiæ and Tabulæ Regiomontanæ are still the models on which all such work is done. His investigations into the length of the seconds-pendulum and that of standards of length were of the highest importance. His triangulation of the Pleiades, his cometary investigations, and many others were all of the highest order of accuracy.

Bessemer (bĕs′-ĕ-mĕr), Sir Henry, English engineer and inventor, born at Charlton, England, in 1813; of his many inventions the chief is the process named after him, of converting pig-iron into steel at once by blowing a blast of air through the iron while in fusion until everything extraneous is expelled, and only a definite quantity of carbon is left in combination, a process which has revolutionized the iron and steel trade all over the world, leading, as has been calculated, to the production of thirty times as much steel as before and at one-fifth of the cost per ton. He was knighted in 1879, and died in 1898.

Bessey, Charles Edwin, scientist, professor of botany in the university of Nebraska since 1884; born on a farm in Milton, Ohio, 1845; graduate of Michigan agricultural college, 1869; studied with Dr. Asa Gray at Harvard, 1872-73 and 1875-76; Ph. D., university of Iowa; LL. D., Iowa college; professor of botany in Iowa agricultural college, 1870–84; acting president, 1882; acting chancellor of university of Nebraska, 1888–91, 1899-1900 and 1907. Botanical editor of American Naturalist, 1880–97, of Science since 1897. Author: The Essentials of Botany; Botany for High Schools and Colleges; Elementary Botanical Exercises; Elementary Botany; Plant Migration Studies, and many scientific papers and reviews. Edited McNab's Morphology, Physiology, and Classification of Plants.

Bethmann-Hollweg (bāt′-mān hōl′-vāᴋ), Dr. Theobald von, statesman, philosopher, imperial chancellor of the German empire, was born at Hohenfinow, near Berlin, Prussia, in 1856; of Jewish lineage; educated at the university of Bonn; elected to the Reichstag in 1890; president of the province of Brandenburg, 1901; named imperial chancellor in succession to Prince von Bülow, 1909.

Beust (boist), Frederick Ferdinand, Count, German statesman, was born at Dresden in 1809. He devoted himself to politics and was employed by his government in different services in Berlin, Paris, and London. In 1849 he was made minister of foreign affairs in Saxony. He opposed Prussia, and after the battle of Sadowa entered the service of Austria, where he was made chancellor in 1867. He completely reorganized the Austrian empire, and the present constitution was his work. He was Austrian ambassador at London, 1871–78, and acted in the same capacity at Paris, 1878–82. He died in 1886.

Beveridge, Albert Jeremiah, lawyer, writer, United States senator from Indiana, 1899–1911; born on a farm on border of Adams and Highland counties, Ohio, 1862; family moved to Illinois after war; from age of twelve led a life of privations; plowboy at twelve, railroad laborer at fourteen, logger and teamster at fifteen, then attended high school; graduated from De Pauw university, Indiana, 1885; read law in office of Senator McDonald, became managing clerk; admitted to bar and was associated with McDonald & Butler until he began practice for himself; identified with many important cases; elected to the United States senate, 1899; reëlected in 1905; well known as orator and republican campaign speaker. Author: The Russian Advance, The Young Man and the World.

Beza (bē′-zä), Théodore, Genevese reformer, was born at Vezelay, Burgundy, 1519, and studied Greek and law at Orleans. He first became known as a writer of witty verses, settled with brilliant prospects at Paris, and lived for a time in fashionable dissipation. In 1549–59 was Greek professor at Lausanne, published a drama on the Sacrifice of Abraham, and lectured on the Bible. In 1559 he was appointed a theological professor and president of the college at Geneva, and became Calvin's ablest coadjutor. During the French civil war he was chaplain to Condé, and after his capture attached himself to Coligny. In 1563 he once more returned to Geneva, and on Calvin's death the care of the Genevese church fell upon his shoulders. He presided over the synods of French reformers held at La Rochelle in 1571 and at Nimes in 1572. In 1574 he was sent by Condé on a mission to the court of the palatinate; and in 1586 measured himself with the Württemberg divines. He died in 1605.

Bichat (bē′-shä′), Marie François Xavier, celebrated French physician and anatomist, was born at Thoirette (Jura), 1771. He passed the first years of his medical study under the direction of his father, who was also a physician. After spending two years at Lyons, he repaired to Paris in 1793, and attended at the Hôtel-Dieu the clinical lectures of Desault, who, being soon attracted by the superior intelligence evinced by Bichat, took him as his assistant in his surgical practice and in preparing his lectures and works. After the death of his patron in 1795, Bichat showed his gratitude by publishing in 1797 two volumes entitled Œuvres Chirurgicales de Desault, setting forth the great surgeon's doctrines and methods of treatment. He then devoted himself to lecturing on anatomy, physiology, and surgery; and established with several of his friends La Société Médicale d'Emulation, through the medium of which he gave to the world many highly original and important memoirs, notably those on the tissues of the human body. He was nominated physician of the Hôtel-Dieu in 1799, and died in 1802, his premature death being hastened in great part by his incessant labors. His three great works are the Traité des Membranes, in which he classifies the different kinds of tissues, maintaining that all are merely differential forms of the same elementary tissue; the Recherches Physiologiques sur la Vie et la Mort, a work rich in new discoveries and original ideas, in which he defines life to be the "sum-total of the functions which resist death"; and the Traité d'Anatomie Générale, in which he summarizes his now generally received principles, applying them in the same systematic manner to the various departments of biology.

Biddle, A. J. Drexel, author, explorer, and lecturer; born at Philadelphia, Pa., 1874. He was educated at Heidelberg, Germany. Lived in Madeira islands, studying conditions there; returned to the United States in 1891; joined staff of Philadelphia Public Ledger; two years later he severed connection with the Ledger, and contributed to magazines and humorous journals; revived Philadelphia Sunday Graphic in 1895 and became its editor; head of publishing house of Drexel Biddle, in New York, Philadelphia, and San Francisco, 1895–1904. Black, Joseph, eminent British chemist, was born in 1728 at Bordeaux, France. Between 1759 and 1763 he evolved the theory of "latent heat" on which his scientific fame chiefly rests, and which formed the immediate preliminary to the next great stride in discovery by his pupil and assistant, James Watt. Died, 1799.

Black, William, British novelist, was born at Glasgow, 1841; studied art with the view of becoming a landscape-painter. Instead, however, he adopted journalism, having written for the Glasgow Weekly Citizen prior to his removal to London in 1864. During the Prusso-Austrian war of 1866 he was war correspondent for the Morning Star; and in a novel, Love or Marriage, he utilized some of his experiences. In Silk Attire and Kilmeny were fairly successful; but it was A Daughter of Heth that established his reputation. Later novels were The Strange Adventures of a Phaeton; A Princess of Thule, best perhaps of all his many romances; Madcap Violet, Macleod of Dare, Briseis, Wild Eelin, etc. In 1870–74 he was assistant-editor of the Daily News. He graduated in 1847, afterward studied law, was admitted to the bar at the Middle Temple in 1852, and practiced for a time as a conveyancer. Poems by Melanter was the first of several volumes of verse; of his novels the earliest were Clara Vaughan and Cradock Nowell, but his first distinct success was Lorna Doone, a Romance of Exmoor, which reached many editions. Blackmore's other novels, several of which reveal his love of gardening, are: The Maid of Sker, perhaps his second-best story; Alice Lorraine; Cripps the Carrier; Erema; Mary Anerley; Christowell, A Dartmoor Tale; Tommy Upmore; Springhaven; Perlycross, and Dariel. He died in 1900.

Blackstone, Sir William, celebrated English jurist, was born at London, in 1723. He was a judge, a member of parliament, and author of the well-known Commentaries on the Laws of England. At the bar, after seven years' practice, his prospects were so indifferent that he retired to Oxford on his fellowship, and there gave public lectures on English law. Their success is supposed to have suggested to Viner the propriety of establishing a professorship of law in the university, to which office Blackstone was elected, being the first Vinerian lecturer, in 1758. Subsequently, having married, he vacated his fellowship and was appointed principal of New-Inn hall. That office, with his Vinerian professorship, he resigned in 1766. In 1770 he became one of the judges of the common pleas. Died, 1780.

Blaine, James Gillespie, American statesman, was born at Brownsville, Pa., 1830. At seventeen he entered Washington college, Pa., and after graduating taught school at Blue Lick Springs, Ky. In 1854 he went to Maine to engage in journalism, which he relinquished four years later for a seat in the legislature. He served there until 1862, when he was elected to congress and remained there eighteen years. He was balloted on for the presidency at the convention of 1876, and received 351 votes out of a total of 754. He was then appointed United States senator to fill an unexpired term, and four years later was again a candidate for the presidency. President Garfield appointed him secretary of state, which office he held until after the death of the president. He resigned from the cabinet in 1881. In 1884 he received the republican nomination for president, and was defeated by Grover Cleveland. In 1889 he again became secretary of state, in the cabinet of President Harrison. He is the author of Twenty Years of Congress and Political Discussions. He died in 1893.

Author: Southwold; Rockford; Fettered for Life; Woman's Place To-day and A Daring Experiment.

Blake, Robert, English admiral, who, more than any other, contributed to render England mistress of the sea, was born at Bridgewater, in Somersetshire, 1599. In 1649, in conjunction with two other officers of equal rank, he was appointed "general of the sea." This was Blake's true sphere, and in it he soon exhibited transcendent ability. After destroying, with the exception of two vessels, the squadron of Prince Rupert, which had sought safety in the Tagus in 1651, Blake forced the royalists to surrender Guernsey, Jersey, and the Scilly isles. In 1652 he was made sole admiral of the fleet for nine months, and during this year he fought four engagements with Dutch fleets under Tromp, Ruyter, and DeWitt. In the first, on May 19th, the Dutch retreated under cover of darkness, with the loss of one man-of-war captured and another sunk. In the next engagement a squadron of twelve ships was captured; and in the third, on September 28th, three Dutch vessels were destroyed, and the rear-admiral taken. In 1654 Blake was appointed by Cromwell to command an English fleet in the Mediterranean, where he soon made the British flag respected by Dutch, Spanish, and French alike. He next sailed to Algiers and Tripoli, landed, and set free all the English who were detained as slaves. He concluded alliances highly favorable to England with Venice and Tuscany. In 1657 he defeated the Spaniards at Santa Cruz, one of the most daring actions in his memorable career. Died, 1657.

Blake, William, English artist and poet, was born at London, 1757. After studying art for some years, he began to paint in water colors and to engrave illustrations for magazines. At the same time he wrote poetry which showed great power and beauty. Poetical Sketches, Songs of Experience, and Songs of Innocence, are among his best works. Most of his other poems are valuable chiefly because of the wonderful way he had of illustrating and printing them in various colors, which he said had been revealed to him. Among these quaint and now rare editions are Books of Prophecies, Gates of Paradise, Vision of the Daughters of Albion, and America. During his life his genius was little recognized, but many now believe that England has not produced his superior in force and originality. He died at London in 1827.

Blanc (blăN), Jean Joseph Louis, French historian and socialist writer, was born at Madrid, 1811, started as a journalist; founded the Revue du Progrès, and published separately in 1840, Organization of Labor, which had already appeared in the Revue, a work which gained the favor of the working classes; was member of the provisional government of 1848, and eventually of the national assembly; threatened with impeachment, fled to England; returned to France on the fall of the empire, and was elected to the chamber of deputies in 1871. Blanc wrote an elaborate and well-written history of the French revolution. Died at Cannes, 1882.

Pendleton, of New York, 1899. In 1903 appeared at royal Covent Garden, London, in rôles Marguerite, in Faust; Micaela, in Carmen; Juliette, in Romeo and Juliette; Zerline, in Don Giovanni.

Blavatsky (blă-văts'-kĭ), Madame Helena Petrovna, Russian theosophist, was born in Russia in 1831. She was of noble descent and married a Russian councillor of state, from whom she separated early in her married life. She visited Thibet, where she claims she received the theosophical doctrines connected with her name. From 1873 to 1879 she was a resident of New York, became a naturalized American citizen, and founded the theosophical society. She shortly published Isis Unveiled. Her other writings include The Key to Theosophy, The Secret Doctrine, The Voice of Silence, etc. She died in London in 1891.

Blennerhassett (blĕn'-ĕr-hăs'-ĕt), Harman, noted for his connection with Aaron Burr's conspiracy, was born in England about 1764; of Irish descent; becoming unpopular in Ireland, he sold his Irish estates for a sum exceeding $100,000 and came to America. He bought an island of 170 acres in the Ohio river near Parkersburg, W. Va., on which he built a fine mansion and adorned it with all the comforts and refinements which culture could suggest and wealth supply. Many visitors enjoyed his hospitality, and among them Aaron Burr, still bitter because of his political defeat. Burr filled Blennerhassett's mind with plans of forming an empire in Mexico, for which he made extensive preparations. When Burr was arrested and brought to trial, Blennerhassett was also arrested, but on the acquittal of Burr he was released. He died on the island of Guernsey in 1831.

Member German oriental society, American philological association, American philosophical society; hon. member royal Bohemian society, Prague.

Bloomfield, Robert, English pastoral poet, was born in 1766, at Honington, Suffolk, where his father was a poor tailor. He worked first as a farm-servant, then as a shoe-maker in London, and, after unsuccessful efforts in various occupations, died at Shefford, in Bedfordshire, 1823, deprived of memory and almost of reason. His chief works are The Farmer's Boy (composed in a London garret), Rural Tales, and Wild Flowers. They are admirable for their charming artlessness, fidelity to nature, and fresh, honest flavor of rusticity.

Blossom, Henry Martyn, Jr., author, dramatist, was born at St. Louis., Mo., 1866; educated at Stoddard school, St. Louis; afterward engaged in insurance business. Author: The Documents in Evidence; Checkers — A Hard Luck Story; The Brother of Chuck McGann. Plays: Checkers; The Yankee Consul; Mlle. Modiste, a comic opera; The Red Mill, a musical comedy, Miss Philura and The Slim Princess.

Blouet (blōō'-ĕ'), Paul, better known as "Max O'Rell," French author, writer, and lecturer, was born in Brittany, France, in 1848; was educated in Paris; served in the Franco-German war and against the commune, being severely wounded; in 1873 went to England as a newspaper correspondent; was French master at St. Paul's school, 1876–84, and for many years lectured and acted in the United Kingdom, United States, and colonies. He is the author of John Bull and his Island; The Dear Neighbors; A Frenchman in America; John Bull & Co.; Jacques Bonhomme; Jonathan and His Continent, etc. Died, 1903.

Blowitz (blō'-vits), Henri Georges Adolphe Opper de journalist, was born of Jewish ancestry at Blowitz, in Bohemia, 1825; during 1849–60 was a German teacher in various French schools; in 1871–1902, Paris correspondent of the Times, and originator of the "interview." He was made officer of the legion of honor in 1878. Died, 1903.

Blücher (blü'-ᴋĕr), Gebhard Leberecht von, Prussian field marshal and prince of Wahlstadt, was born at Rostock, Germany, 1742; first entered the Swedish, but soon passed to the Prussian army, in which he served during the seven years' war. He went through the Polish campaign of 1772, and gained rapid promotion during the struggle with the French invaders begun in 1792. In the campaign of 1814 Blücher held high command, and though defeated by Napoleon, he beat Marshal Marmont and entered Paris with the allies. In the Waterloo campaign he commanded the Prussian army in Belgium, and was severely defeated by Napoleon at Ligny. However, by out-manœuvring Grouchy, he was able to arrive at Waterloo in time to decide the victory for the allies and pursue the routed French army. He then retired from active service and died 1819.

Blumenbach (blōō'-men-bäᴋ), Johann Friedrich, German naturalist and ethnologist, was born at Gotha in 1752; studied at Jena; became professor at Göttingen, an office he filled for nearly sixty years. His works gave a great impulse to scientific research in all directions; the chief were Institutiones Physiologicæ; Manual of Natural History; Manual of Comparative Anatomy and Physiology. He made craniology a special study; was a great advocate of religious liberty. He was the first to classify the human species as Caucasian, Mongolian, African, American, and Malay. Died, 1840.

Blumenthal (blōō'-men-täl), Leonhardt, Count von, Prussian general, was born in 1810, died in 1900. He was chief of the general staff of the Prussian army in 1849; promoted to lieutenant-general in 1866 for distinguished service in the war with Austria; was chief of staff in the Franco-Prussian war; and became general field-marshal in 1888. He was a very able strategist.

Bluntschli (blŏŏntsh'-lē), Johann Kaspar, jurist, economist, was born at Zürich in 1808; in 1833 became professor in its newly-founded university. In 1848 he went to Munich as professor of civil and international law; in 1861 removed to Heidelberg. Among his works were Allgemeines Staatsrecht, on which his reputation chiefly rests, and Deutsches Privatrecht. He died at Karlsruhe in 1881.

Blythe, Samuel George, writer, journalist; was born at Geneseo, N. Y., 1868; educated at Geneseo state normal school; managing-editor of Buffalo Express, 1893–96; editor-in-chief of Buffalo Enquirer and Courier, 1897-98; in charge of literary bureau, republican state committee, campaign of 1898; managing-editor Cosmopolitan Magazine, 1899; chief Washington correspondent New York World, 1900–07; connected with Saturday Evening Post since 1907; chairman standing committee of Washington correspondents, 1906-07. President of Gridiron club, 1907.

Boabdil (bō'-äb-dēl'), properly Abu-Abdallah, the last Moorish king of Granada, dethroned his father, Abu-l-Hasan in 1481, and two years later was defeated and taken prisoner by the Castilians near Lucena. He was set free on condition of paying tribute, and returned to Granada to struggle with his father and with his uncle for the throne. The fall of Malaga was but the prelude to the siege of the capital itself, which was finally starved out in 1491, in spite of the reckless courage of the Moors and of Boabdil, whose weak and vacillating nature fell from him in the hour of battle. The spot from which he looked his last on Granada, after giving up to Ferdinand the keys of the city, still bears the name of el ultimo sospiro del Moro, "the last sigh of the Moor." Boabdil soon crossed to Africa and flung away his life in battle. He died in 1536.

Boatwright, Frederic William, educator, president Richmond college since 1895; born at White Sulphur Springs, W. Va., 1868; graduated from Richmond college, M. A., 1888; LL. D., Mercer, 1896; studied in Halle, Leipzig, and Paris, 1889-90, 1892; professor modern languages, Richmond college, since 1890. Author: Syllabi French and German Literatures.

Bobadilla (bō-vä-dēl'-yä), Francisco, was sent in 1500 by Ferdinand and Isabella to investigate the work of Columbus in Hispaniola. He put Columbus in chains and sent him to Spain, but was recalled and Columbus reinstated. Bobadilla was drowned on the return voyage in 1502.

Boccaccio (bōk-kä'-chō), Giovanni, Italian raconteur, the author of the Decamerone, was born probably in Paris in 1313. He styled himself

Da Certaldo, from the Italian village from which his family sprang. From an early period he displayed a love for poetry. In 1350 he formed an intimate friendship with Petrarch, and, following his friend's example, collected many books and copied rare MSS. which he could not afford to buy. It is said that he was the first Italian who ever procured from Greece a copy of the Iliad and the Odyssey. He also wrote a genealogy of the gods in fifteen books. But not only was Boccaccio one of the most learned men of his time, he was also one of the most enlightened in his scholarship. He helped to give a freer direction and a greater expansiveness to knowledge, stimulated his contemporaries to the study of Greek, and wished to substitute the wisdom of antiquity for the unprofitable scholasticism that prevailed. While in Naples, about 1334, he fell passionately in love with a young woman, called by him Fiammetta, who was generally supposed to be a daughter of King Robert. His passion was returned, and to gratify her he wrote Il Filocopo, a prose-romance, and afterward, La Teseide, the first attempt at romantic epic poetry, of which Boccaccio may be considered the inventor. In 1340 he returned to Florence, but in 1344 went back to Naples, where he wrote his Amorosa Fiammetta. He composed his famous Decamerone in Naples, to please Joanna, the daughter and successor of King Robert. It consists of 100 stories, ten of which are told each day by seven ladies and three gentlemen, who had fled from Florence during the frightful plague of 1348, to a country villa, and who try to banish fear by abandoning every moment to gayety. In abundance of incident it is almost inexhaustible, though many of the stories are taken from older collections of Contes et Fabliaux. It is, however, unfortunately steeped in impurity. Petrarch's death deeply affected him, and he died the year after, 1375.

Böcklin (bûk'-lēn), Arnold, Swiss painter of romantic subjects, was born at Basel, Switzerland, 1827. His principal pictures are the "Sea Idyl," "A Nymph and Fauns," and several landscapes. In a certain element of fancy, fantastic and weird rather than truly imaginative, Böcklin excels all his contemporaries. He is seen at his best at Munich. Died at Fiesole, Italy, 1901.

Bode (bō'-dē), Johann Elert, German astronomer, was born at Hamburg, 1747; at the age of eighteen he calculated an eclipse of the sun. The next year he wrote on the solar eclipse of August 5th, and an elementary treatise on astronomy which was especially successful. In 1776 he commenced the Astronomical Year Book, which is still continued. But his fame rests chiefly on the Uranographia, published in 1801, in which he gives observations on 17,240 stars, or 12,000 more than can be found in any previous charts. He reproduced the statement of the relations of the planetary distances, previously made known by Titus of Wittenberg, but afterward called "Bode's law." He died at Berlin in 1826.

Bodenstedt (bō'-den-shtĕt), Friedrich Martin von, German poet, author, journalist, was born at Peine, Hanover, 1819, and died at Wiesbaden, 1892, having lived at Moscow, traveled in the Crimea, Turkey, Greece, and Asia Minor, edited the Weser Zeitung, filled the chairs of Slav languages and Old English at Munich, and been director of the Meiningen court theater. Bodenstedt published many translations from the Russian, English (Shakespeare), and Persian, and several volumes of poetry, including dramas and romances. His most popular work is the Lieder des Mirza Schaffy, feigned to be a translation from the Tartar.

Bodin (bō'-dăɴ'), Jean, French publicist and economist, was born at Angers in 1530, and died of the plague at Laon, 1596. According to Bodin's greatest work, Les Six Livres de la République, property and the family form the basis of society, and a limited monarchy is the best possible form of government. His Methodus ad Facilem Historiarum Cognitionem is by some writers deemed the foundation of the true philosophy of history.

Bodley, Sir Thomas, the restorer of the library originally established at Oxford by Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, now called the Bodleian library, was born in 1545. His family being forced to flee from England during the persecutions of Mary, he settled at Geneva. On the accession of Elizabeth he returned to England, and completed his studies at Oxford, took the degree of M. A., and was afterward elected a proctor. After being some time abroad he was employed by the queen in diplomatic missions to Denmark, France, and Holland, and returned to Oxford in 1597, devoting himself to the extension of the library. Died, 1613.

Boehm (bēm), Sir Joseph Edgar, Hungarian-English sculptor, was born at Vienna, 1834; educated 1848–51 in England, and finally settled there in 1862. In 1867 he executed a colossal statue of the queen; of his seated statue of Thomas Carlyle, enthusiastically praised by Ruskin, a replica was erected at Chelsea. His other most important works are busts of Ruskin, Gladstone, Huxley, Lord Wolseley; figures of Dean Stanley and Sir Francis Drake; and equestrian statues of Lord Northbrook at Calcutta, and of Prince Albert at Windsor. Boehm became an A. R. A. in 1878, sculptor-in-ordinary to the queen in 1881, an R. A. in 1882, and a baronet in 1889. On December 12, 1890, the princess Louise found him sitting dead in his studio.

Boehme, Jakob, German theosophist and mystic, was born of poor parents at Altseidenberg near Görlitz, in upper Lusatia, in 1575, and in boyhood herded cattle. He afterward worked industriously as a shoemaker, but from his youth up devoted much of his time to meditation on divine things. About 1612 he published Aurora, containing revelations and meditations upon God, man, and nature, and showing a remarkable knowledge of scripture and of the writings of alchemists. It was condemned by the ecclesiastical authorities of Görlitz and he suffered much persecution, though he was at last protected by the Saxon court. The difficulties of the great problems of philosophy and religion are rather concealed than explained under a cloud of mystical language and a system of triads, suggested by the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. He died at Görlitz in 1624.

Boehm von Bawerk (bēm fōn bä'-vĕrk), Eugen, Austrian political economist, was born at Brünn, Austria, 1851. He was educated at the universities at Vienna, Heidelberg, Leipzig, and Jena. In 1884 was appointed professor at Innsbruck; at intervals from 1889 to 1904 was minister of finance. His chief work is Capital and Interest.

Boerhaave, (Dutch, bo͞or'-hä-ve), (Eng., bōr'-häv), Hermann, the most celebrated physician of the eighteenth century, was born near Leyden, Holland, 1668. In 1689 he was made doctor of philosophy, and in 1690 began the study of medicine, reading carefully Hippocrates among the ancients, and Sydenham among the moderns. He gained his doctor's degree at Harderwijk, 1693, and returned to Leyden, where in 1701 he was appointed lecturer on the theory of medicine. To combine practice with theory, he caused a hospital to be opened, where he gave clinical instructions to his pupils. Though so industrious in his own profession, he undertook in 1718, after Lemort's death, the professorship of chemistry, and published in 1724 his Elementa Chemiæ, a work which did much to render this science clear and intelligible, and although now entirely superseded by more advanced researches, one that will always occupy a high place in the history of chemistry. Peter the Great of Russia visited him at Leyden, and it is even said that a Chinese mandarin sent him a letter, addressed "Herr Boerhaave, Celebrated Physician, Europe." His fame rests principally on his Institutiones Medicæ, and Aphorismi de Cognoscendis et Curandis Morbis. He was a member of many learned academies. Died at Leyden, 1738.

Boethius (bō-ĕ'-thĭ-ŭs), Anicius Manlius Torquatus Severinus, Roman philosopher, born about 475, was profoundly learned, and filled the highest offices under the government of Theodoric the Goth. Three times consul, he was long the oracle of his sovereign and the idol of the people; but his strict integrity and inflexible justice incited enemies to whose machinations he at last fell a victim. Falsely accused of a treasonable correspondence with the court of Constantinople, he was executed about 525, after a long and rigorous imprisonment. His Consolations of Philosophy, written in prison, abounds in the loftiest sentiments clothed in the most fascinating language.

Boileau-Despréaux (bwä'-lō'-dā'-prā'-ō'), Nicholas, French poet and critic, was born at Paris in 1636. His first work was a satire, Adieu of a Poet to the city of Paris. He was a friend of Molière, LaFontaine, and Racine, and was pensioned by the king. His Art of Poetry is considered very fine. He did much as a critic to purify and refine the French language, and has had a great influence on French literature. He was made a member of the French academy. He died at Paris in 1711.

Boito (bō'-ē-tō), Arrigo, Italian composer and poet, was born in 1842 at Padua, and studied at the Milan conservatory. His first important work is the Wagnerian opera Mefistofele, which, at first an acknowledged failure, has since steadily grown in popularity. Other operas are Ero e Leandro, Nerone, Oda all' Arte. He writes his own librettos, and has published several songs, lyrical dramas, and novels, besides the following cantatas: Le 4 Juin; Le Sorelle d'Italia; Libretti Otello; Falstaff; La Gioconda; Amleto; Ero e Leandro and Nero.

Bok, Edward William, editor of The Ladies' Home Journal since 1889; vice-president of the Curtis publishing company; born in Helder, Holland, 1863; came to the United States at the age of six; educated at Brooklyn public schools; stenographer with Western Union telegraph company; Henry Holt & Co., 1884-85; Scribner's, 1885–88. Author: The Young Man in Business, and Successward.

Boker (bō'-kẽr), George Henry, American poet and dramatist, was born at Philadelphia in 1823, and died there in 1890. He wrote several plays, which were successful on the stage, among them Calaynos, a tragedy, and Francesca da Rimini. His war poems, written during the civil war, were published in a volume entitled Poems of the War. He was appointed minister to Constantinople, and after four years was transferred to St. Petersburg. In 1882 he published a volume of verse, The Book of the Dead.

Boleyn (bŏŏl'-ĭn), Anne, queen of England and daughter of Sir Thomas Boleyn, subsequently earl of Wiltshire and Ormond; was born about 1507 and was brought up at the French court. She became maid of honor to Queen Catharine of England. King Henry VIII. was attracted by her beauty, had his marriage with Catharine declared void, and was married privately to Anne. She soon lost his favor, and on a charge of unfaithfulness was tried, condemned, and beheaded, 1536. She was the mother of Queen Elizabeth.

Bolingbroke (bŏl'-ĭn-brŏŏk), Henry St. John, Viscount, English statesman, was born in Battersea in 1678. Having studied at Oxford, he entered parliament in 1701, and in 1704 became secretary for war. He afterward became secretary of state for foreign affairs, and negotiated the treaty of Utrecht. In 1712 he was raised to the peerage. On the accession of George I. he was impeached of high treason, when he fled from the country, and became secretary of state to the first pretender. He was attainted and his estate seized; but in 1723 he was permitted to return. His estates were restored, but he was not allowed to sit in parliament. He wrote against the ministry, and his productions were admired for their eloquence and vigor. He again withdrew to France in 1735, but returned to England on the death of his father, and died in 1751.

Bolivar (bŏl'-ĭ-vär), Simon, South American statesman, founder and first president of the republic of Colombia, known as "the liberator of South America." Born in Venezuela, 1783, he was educated in Madrid, and traveled in Europe and the United States. When the revolt against the Spanish yoke broke out in Venezuela, he joined it, but had to fly. In 1813 he returned, and, gathering a force together, defeated General Monteverde at Carácas. The tide then turned and Bolivar fled to Jamaica, but he shortly returned, and after varying fortune in 1819 won the battle of Bojaca, resulting in the inauguration of the republic of Venezuela in the same year, to which was afterward united New Granada. In 1822 Bolivar went to help the Peruvians in their struggle for liberty, and was given the chief command. After a long campaign he won the great battle of Ayacucho. Upper Peru was constituted a separate republic with the title of Bolivia. As president of Colombia he had to endure much factious hostility; but though he tendered his resignation more than once it was never accepted, the supreme power being confirmed in him in 1828. Died, 1830.

Bolles (bōlz), Albert Sidney, author, economist, was born at Montville, Conn., 1846; admitted to Connecticut bar and engaged in practice; elected judge of the probate court for district of Norwich, Conn., 1870; editor Norwich Bulletin, and later editor Bankers' Magazine; was professor of mercantile law and banking, Wharton school of finance and economy, university of Pennsylvania, four and one-half years; chief bureau industrial statistics, Pa., eight years; was lecturer, university of Pennsylvania, now at Haverford college. Author: Financial History of the United States; Practical Banking; Bank Officers; Bank Collections; The Judicial Interpretation of the National Bank Act; Industrial History of the United States; The Conflict Between Labor and Capital; The History of Pennsylvania; Money, Banking, and Finance.

Bolton, Sarah Knowles, author; born at Farmington, Conn., 1841; daughter of John Segar and Mary Elizabeth (Miller) Knowles; spent two years in Europe studying literary and educational matters, and what employers are doing to help their workmen; married Charles E. Bolton in 1866, who died in 1901. Was for three years associate editor The Congregationalist. Author: Orlean Lamar and Other Poems; The Present Problem (a short novel); How Success is Won; Poor Boys Who Became Famous; Girls Who Became Famous; Social Studies in England; Stories from Life (fiction); From Heart and Nature, poems (with her son, Charles K. Bolton);

A Country Idyl and Other Stories (fiction); Every Day Living; Our Devoted Friend, the Dog, and many biographical books dealing with famous men and women.

Bonaparte, Charles Joseph, lawyer, ex-secretary of the navy, and ex-attorney general, United States, was born in Baltimore, 1851; grandson of Jerome Bonaparte, king of Westphalia; graduate of Harvard in 1871, Harvard law school in 1874; since then in law practice in Baltimore; prominent in reform movements; republican presidential elector from Maryland, 1904; member council of national civil service reform league; president of national municipal league; member United States board of Indian commissioners, 1902-04; overseer at Harvard, 1891–1903, trustee Catholic university of America since 1904; awarded Lætare medal by university of Notre Dame, 1903; was secretary of the navy, 1905–06; attorney-general of United States, 1906–09.

Bonaparte, Charles Lucien Jules Laurent, prince of Canino and Musignano, Lucien's eldest son by his second marriage, was born at Paris in 1803. He never exhibited any inclination for political life, preferring the more quiet pursuits of literature and science. He acquired a considerable reputation as a naturalist, and especially as a writer on ornithology. Died, 1857.

Bonaparte, Jérôme, youngest brother of Napoleon I., was born at Ajaccio in 1784. He served as naval lieutenant in the expedition to Hayti. When war broke out between France and England in 1803, Jérôme was cruising off the West Indies, but he was soon compelled to take refuge in the port of New York. While in the United States he married, in 1803, Elizabeth Patterson, of Baltimore, who died in 1879. Subsequently he was employed by Napoleon in the liberation of Genoese prisoners who had been captured by the dey of Algiers. In the war with Prussia he commanded, in concert with General Vandamme, the 10th corps in Silesia, and in 1807 was made king of Westphalia. After his brother's abdication he left Paris, 1814, and visited Switzerland and Austria, but ultimately settled in Florence. His request to be allowed to return to France was rejected, but was afterward granted. He was appointed governor of the Invalides in 1848, and in 1850 was made a French marshal. In 1852 provision was made by the French chambers, in default of issue of Napoleon III., by which the right of succession was confirmed to Jérôme and his heirs. Died, 1860.

Bonaparte, Joseph, eldest brother of Napoleon I., was born at Corte, in Corsica, 1768, and was educated at Autun. On the death of his father he returned to Corsica, exerted himself to support the younger members of the family, and removed with them to Marseilles in 1793. In 1797 he was elected a member of the council of five hundred, and in the same year was sent as ambassador from the republic to Rome. In 1800, having proved his ability in several offices of state, he was chosen by the first consul as plenipotentiary to conclude a treaty of friendship with the United States. After the coronation of Napoleon, Joseph was made commander-in-chief of the army of Naples; in 1805, ruler of the Two Sicilies; and in 1806, king of Naples. In 1808 he was summarily transferred by his brother to the throne of Spain, and Murat took his place as king of Naples. For Joseph this was no favorable change; he found himself unprepared to cope with the Spanish insurgents, and after the defeat of the French at Vittoria he returned to his estate at Morfontaine, in France. After the battle of Waterloo he accompanied Napoleon to Rochefort, whence they intended to sail separately for the United States. He died in Florence in 1844.

Bonaparte, Josephine (wife of Napoleon I.). See Josephine.

Bonaparte, Louis, brother of Napoleon I., was born in 1778. After rising from honor to honor he was nominally made king of Holland, being little more than a governor subordinate to his brother. Whatever may have been the faults of his reign, it is highly to his credit that although a foreigner he administered the affairs of the kingdom in the interest of his people. He refused to accept the tendered crown of Spain, and did not enrich himself by his reign. After the restoration of the house of Orange, Louis considered himself free from all responsibility, and returned to Paris, 1814. On the escape of his son, Louis Napoleon, from the prison of Ham, Louis was removed as an invalid to Leghorn. Died, 1846.

Bonaparte, Lucien, brother of Napoleon, and prince of Canino, was born in 1775; received his education in the college of Autun. Rising gradually from one office to another, he was elected deputy for the department of Liamone, and in the council of five hundred spoke against the squandering of state property, and formed a party favorable to the views of his brother Napoleon. Shortly before the 18th Brumaire he was elected president of the council of five hundred, and was the hero of that day. As ambassador to Madrid, 1800, he contrived to gain the confidence of King Charles IV. and his favorite, Godoy. It is said that for his services in the treaty of peace concluded between Spain and Portugal, 1801, he received 5,000,000 francs. His opposition to Napoleon's progress toward monarchy involved the brothers in many quarrels. In 1810 he sailed for America, but fell into the hands of the English, was taken to England, and after a debate in parliament was declared a prisoner, but treated with distinction. After his brother's downfall he returned to Rome. Died, 1840.

Bonaparte, Napoleon. See Napoleon I., page 485.

Bonaparte, Napoleon Eugène Louis Jean Joseph, son of Napoleon III. and of the empress Eugénie, born in 1856; was educated under his father's care at Paris and Versailles. On the outbreak of war with Prussia, 1870, he went with the emperor to the front, and was present at the battle of Gravelotte. On the abdication of Napoleon III., and on the declaration of a republic in France, the youth and his mother took refuge at Chiselhurst, England. Soon after he entered the military school at Woolwich arsenal to complete his studies, and was graduated with high honors. When the Zulu war in South Africa commenced, the young man volunteered his services to the British government and was killed in 1879.

Bonaparte, Napoleon Joseph Charles Paul, nicknamed Plon-Plon, son of Jérôme Bonaparte and Sophia Dorothea, was born in 1822; married, 1859, Princess Clotilde of Sardinia. By virtue of the decree of the French senate, 1852, Napoleon Joseph became in 1879, on the death of Prince Napoleon, son of the emperor, the representative of the Bonapartist claim to the French throne. From early manhood he was an advocate of a popular form of government. Died, 1891.

Bonar (bŏn'-ar), Horatius, hymn-writer, was born at Edinburgh in 1808; from the high school passed to the university, and became minister at Kelso Free church, 1837–66, and then at Edinburgh. He edited the Christian Treasury and other magazines, and published some forty religious works, but is best known as the author of Hymns of Faith and Hope. He died in 1889.

Bonar, James, author, economist, was born at Collace, Perthshire, Scotland, 1852; educated at Glasgow university; Leipzig and Tübingen; Balliol college, Oxford. Lecturer in east London, 1877–80; junior examiner in H. M. civil service commission, 1881; senior examiner, 1895; deputy master of Canadian branch of royal mint, 1907. Author: Beck's Biblical Psychology; Parson Malthus; Malthus and his Work; Ricardo's Letters to Malthus; Philosophy and Political Economy; Political Economy; contributions to Craik's Prose Authors, Palgrave's Dictionary of Political Economy, Conrad's Handwörterbuch der Staatswissenschaften, and Encyclopædia Britannica.

Bonaventura (bō′-nä-vĕn-tōō′-rä), Saint, cardinal, surnamed the "seraphic doctor," his real name John of Fidenza, was born in Tuscany in 1221; entered Franciscan order; was chosen general of the order and papal legate at the council of Lyons in 1274, during the session of which he died; was a mystic in theology; ascribed knowledge of the truth to union with God, such as existed between man and his Maker prior to the fall, a state which could be removed only by a life of purity and prayer; his writings were admired by Luther.

Bond, Rt. Hon. Sir Robert, premier and colonial secretary of Newfoundland since 1900, was born in 1857; was educated for the bar but entered politics before being admitted; entered the legislature, 1882; elected speaker of the assembly, 1884; an executive councillor, with portfolio of colonial secretary, 1889–97; appointed a delegate to British government by the government of Newfoundland on the French treaties question, 1890; in the same year the British government appointed him to assist Lord Pauncefote in negotiating a reciprocity treaty with the United States, and he was mainly instrumental in completing what is known as the Bond-Blaine convention; appointed chairman of the deputation sent by the government to the "Ottawa conference," 1895; special delegate to conference on French treaties in Downing street, 1901; recipient of the freedom of the city of Edinburgh, 1902; in the same year was authorized by British government to reopen negotiations with the United States for reciprocal trade between that country and Newfoundland, and succeeded in concluding the treaty known as the Hay-Bond treaty; assisted in drafting regulations for carrying out Anglo-French convention, 1904; hon. LL. D., Edinburgh.

Bonet-Maury (bō′-nā′ mō′-rē′), Amy-Gaston, theologian, author, educator, vice-dean of Protestant school of divinity of Paris; was born 1842; educated Lycée Henry IV., Paris; schools of divinity Geneva and Strassburg; served as Presbyterian minister in the Walloon churches of Netherland, 1868–72; called back to France after the disasters of his country in 1870-71, he served as Protestant minister at Beauvais, where he erected the first church, and at St. Denis; lecturer in church history at Protestant school of divinity of Paris, 1879; for twenty years took a large share in all endeavors made to improve in France primary education as librarian of the Musée Pedagogique, and to advance the knowledge of the history of the Huguenots. French delegate at congress of health and education, London, 1884; the parliament of religions, Chicago, 1893; the congress of religious sciences at Stockholm, 1897, and of free religious thinkers at Paris, 1900, London 1901, Basel 1903, and Boston 1907; corresponding member of the Institut de France, 1908. He has written many books on religion and education.

Bonheur (bō′-nẽr′), Marie Rosalie (more commonly called Rosa), French artist, was born in Bordeaux in 1822. Her first master was her own father, Raymond Bonheur, an artist of merit, who died in 1853. In 1841 she contributed for the first time two small pictures to the French exhibition, "Two Rabbits," and "Goats and Sheep," followed by a succession of highly finished compositions, the year 1849 producing what some consider her finest picture, "Tillage in Nivernais," which has been placed in the collection of the Luxembourg. In 1853 her famous "Horse Fair" was the principal attraction of the Paris exhibition, and in 1865 she sent to the Universal exhibition at Paris a new landscape of large dimensions, "Hay-making Season in Auvergne." From 1849 she directed the gratuitous school of design for young girls. During the siege of Paris, 1870-71, her studio and residence at Fontainebleau were spared and respected by special order of the crown prince of Prussia. Her picture of the "Horse Fair" came into the possession of the late A. T. Stewart, of New York, and at the sale of his pictures in 1887 was bought for $55,500 by Cornelius Vanderbilt, and by him presented to the Metropolitan museum, New York. Died, 1899.

Boniface (bŏn′-ĭ-fās), Saint, was born at Crediton, in Devonshire, 680. He was one of the most noted saints of the Roman Catholic church, generally styled "the apostle of Germany." His real name was Winfrid, and he devoted himself early to the monastic life. For many years he engaged with much success in preaching and establishing churches in Germany, but was finally killed by a mob of armed pagans at Dokkum, in West Friesland. He was appointed archbishop of Mainz by Pope Gregory II., and held the archbishopric until 754. Died, 755.

Boniface VIII., previously Benedetto Gaetano, a native of Anagni, was born about 1228, and elected pope in 1294. He failed in his attempts to assert a feudal superiority over Sicily, and to exercise his papal authority in the disputes between France and England. Philip "the fair" of France, maintained the independence of the kingdom, disregarding even the sentence of excommunication to which the pope proceeded. Philip, at last, with the aid of Italian enemies of Boniface, made him prisoner at Anagni, to which he had fled; and, although he was liberated by the people of Anagni after two days' imprisonment, he died within about a month, 1303.

Bonnat (bō′-nä′), Léon Joseph Florentin, French painter, was born at Bayonne, 1833, and studied at Madrid, in Paris, and in Italy. He became famous for religious pictures, and latterly is best known as a great portrait painter. His portraits of Thiers and Victor Hugo are much esteemed. He is a member of the institute.

Bonner, Edmund, English prelate, bishop of London, was born about 1500. The reputation he gained at Oxford by his knowledge of the canon law recommended him to the notice of Wolsey, who promoted him to several offices in the church. After the fall of Wolsey, Bonner took an active share in the work of the reformation, and received due promotion from Henry VIII. In 1533 he was deputed to appear before the pope at Marseilles, to appeal for the excommunicated monarch to a general council. In 1540 he was made bishop of London. The death of Henry cooled his Protestant zeal; and having given proofs of his lukewarmness in the cause of the reformation, he was at length, in 1549, committed to the Marshalsea, and deprived of his bishopric. The accession of Queen Mary restored him to office, and gave him the opportunity of revenge. As vicegerent and president of the convocation he was the principal agent in that bloody persecution which has made the reign of Mary infamous. After the accession of Elizabeth he refused to take the oath of supremacy. He was accordingly deposed from his bishopric and shut up in the Marshalsea, where he died in 1569.

Bonnet (bō'-nĕ'), Charles, French naturalist and philosopher, was born at Geneva, 1720. His Recherches sur l' Usage des Feuilles des Plantes, published in 1754, contained the result of much observation on important points of vegetable physiology. He published several works on psychology, in which materialistic views decidedly prevail; but in his Idées sur l'État Futur des Etres Vivants, ou Palingénésie Philosophique, he endeavored to demonstrate the reasonableness of the Christian revelation, and maintained the future life of all living creatures, and the perfection of their faculties in a future state. His Considérations sur les Corps Organisés is devoted to an examination of the theories of generation. He was for some years a member of the great council of his native city. Died, 1793.

Bonnivard, de (dē bō'-nē'-văr'), François, French historian and hero of Byron's Prisoner of Chillon; was born near Geneva, 1496; educated at Turin, and became prior of St. Victor, near Geneva, 1510, at the age of fourteen years. An ardent republican, he took sides with the Genevese against Duke Charles III. of Savoy. Having fallen into the hands of robbers who delivered him into the power of the duke of Savoy, he was imprisoned in 1530 in the castle of Chillon. The Genevese aided by the Bernese effected his liberation in 1536. The last four years he had spent in horrid dungeons, where, by his monotonous and perpetual walking, he had worn a deep channel into the rock that formed the floor of his wretched abode. On his return to Geneva he enjoyed the honors due to his patriotism, and was made one of the council of two hundred. He wrote a history of Geneva and other works, and has sometimes been called the "Rabelais of Geneva." He died about 1570.

Boone, Daniel, American hunter and pioneer, was born in Bucks county, Pa., 1735. His father, a farmer, moved to North Carolina when Daniel was eighteen years old. The boy had but little education, but he knew the woods and Indian life. When thirty-four years old he went with five others into the wilds of Kentucky. He had many adventures and fights with the savages, and was captured by them, but escaped; in 1775 he moved his own and five other families there from North Carolina. He built a fort on the Kentucky river which he named Boonesborough. The Indians attacked the fort several times, but were driven off. In 1778 they caught Boone while away from the fort and carried him to Detroit, where one of them adopted him as a son. Hearing of a plan to attack Boonesborough he ran away, and, reaching his fort, made ready and defended it with about fifty men against a large force of Canadians and Indians. He lived there until 1792. In 1795 he went to Missouri, where he died in 1820.

Booth, Ballington, general-in-chief and president Volunteers of America, was born at Brighouse, England, 1859; son of Rev. William and Catherine Booth. Commander Salvation Army, Australia, 1885–87; United States, 1887–96; founded, 1896, the Volunteers of America (incorporated November 6, 1896), a religious philanthropic organization. Ordained presbyter, Chicago, 1896; married Sept., 1886, Maud Charlesworth, who is also active in Volunteers of America. Writer, public speaker, philanthropist.

Booth, Edwin Thomas, American actor, son of Junius Brutus Booth, was born in Baltimore, Md., 1833; appeared first on the stage in 1849, in Richard III. He speedily rose in his profession, visited England and the continent of Europe in 1861, 1880, and 1883, and met with enthusiastic receptions. From 1886 to 1891 he appeared with Lawrence Barrett. His last appearance was in Hamlet in 1891. He opened Booth's theater in New York, 1869, and did more than any other individual to keep the tone of dramatic art up to a moral and literary standard. Died, 1893.

Booth, Junius Brutus, actor, was born in England in 1796; first appeared on the stage in 1813, in the Honeymoon, and within four years became famous in London as Richard III. His American career was a triumph, yet marred by intemperance. He died in 1852.

Borghese (bŏr-gā'-sā), Marie Pauline, princess, originally Bonaparte, sister of Napoleon, was born in 1780, at Ajaccio. Her first husband was General Leclerc, and after his death in 1802 she married the prince Camillo Borghese. With Napoleon, who loved her tenderly, she had many disputes and as many reconciliations; for if he was capricious, she was also proud. Before the battle of Waterloo she placed all her diamonds, which were of great value, at his disposal; and they were in his carriage, which was taken in that battle, and exhibited in London. She lived afterward, separated from her husband, at Rome, where her house was the center of refined and fashionable society. She died at Florence in 1825.

Borgia (bôr'-jä), Cesare, Italian master of statecraft of great but evil fame, was born in 1476, the fourth son of Pope Alexander VI., by Rosa Vanozza, was created a cardinal, though he divested himself of the office in later years to suit his purposes. He compassed the death of his brother, Giovanni, who was the duke of Gandia, in order to gain complete ascendancy in the papal government; and in 1498, having been sent as nuncio to Louis XII. of France, he was created duke of Valentinois and married the daughter of Jean d'Albret, king of Navarre. After accompanying Louis XII.'s Italian campaign, he conceived the idea of a kingdom in central Italy, and by force, treachery, and murder he had nearly succeeded in obtaining ascendancy throughout the Roman states, when the death of his father deprived him of his great source of power. He was sent in 1504 a prisoner to Spain by Pope Julius II., but escaped and joined the king of Navarre's army against Castile. In this campaign he was killed in 1507.

Borgia, Lucrezia, sister of the preceding, and like him the possessor of an infamous reputation, was born in 1480. Her father compelled her twice to marriage and divorce before she became the wife of the duke of Bisceglia. After her third husband had been murdered by Cesare Borgia, she married Alfonso of Este, and passed her life in the court of Ferrara, cultivating literature and art. Died, 1519.

Borromeo (bŏr'-rō-mĕ'-ō), Carlo, Count, cardinal and archbishop of the Roman Catholic church, who exercised great influence during the pontificate of Pope Pius IV., was born at the castle of Arona, on the Lago Maggiore, northern Italy, 1538. His energy was especially displayed during the famine of 1570, and during the plague in Milan in 1576. Many supposed miracles at his tomb led to his being canonized in 1610 by Pope Paul V. Several memoirs of him have been published. Died, 1584.

Borrow, George, English author and traveler, was born in Norfolk in 1803. His travels, as agent for the British and Foreign Bible society, through almost all countries of Europe and a part of Africa, made him familiar with many modern languages, even to their dialectic peculiarities. He made the gypsies one of the principal subjects of his study. His first important work, The Zincali, or An Account of the Gypsies in Spain, made a favorable impression. It was followed by The Bible in Spain. Died, 1881.

Bory de Saint Vincent (bō'-rē' dĕ săN văN'-săN'), Jean Baptiste George Marie, French traveler and naturalist, was born in 1780 at Agen, Lot-et-Garonne. In 1798 he proceeded, along with Captain Baudin, in a scientific mission to New Holland, but separated from him before they reached their destination. On his return he wrote his Essai sur les Iles Fortunées de l'antique Atlantide, and his Voyage dans les quatre principales Iles des Mers d'Afrique. Having joined the army, he served at Ulm and Austerlitz, and on Soult's staff in Spain. He served as colonel at Waterloo, and afterward had to retire to Belgium. At Brussels he edited, together with Van Mons, the Annales des Sciences Physiques. He returned to France in 1820, wrote for liberal journals, and for Courtin's Encyclopédie, etc. In 1827 appeared his L'Homme, Essai Zoölogique sur le Genre humain. He rendered an important service to science by editing the Dictionnaire Classique de l'Histoire Naturelle. Boscawen (bŏs'-kȧ-wĕn), Edward, the admiral "Old Dreadnought," was born in Cornwall, England, 1711, the son of Viscount Falmouth. He highly distinguished himself at the taking of Porto Bello, 1739, at the siege of Carthagena, 1741, and in command of the Dreadnought, in 1744, captured the French Médée, with 800 prisoners. He had an important share in the victory of Cape Finisterre, 1747, where he was wounded in the shoulder; and in command of the East Indian expedition displayed high military skill in the retreat from Pondicherry. He returned to England in 1750. In 1755 he intercepted the French fleet off Newfoundland, capturing two 64-gun ships and 1,500 men; in 1758 he was commander-in-chief of the successful expedition against Cape Breton. Boscawen crowned his career by his signal victory over the French Toulon fleet in Lagos bay, 1759. He received the thanks of parliament, a pension of 3,000 pounds a year, a seat in the privy council, and the command of the marines. He died at his Surrey seat, Hatchlands Park, 1761.

Bossuet (bō'-sü'-ĕ'), Jacques Bénigne, a distinguished orator and prelate of the Roman Catholic church, was born in Dijon, France, 1627; bishop of Condom and of Meaux, and tutor to the dauphin, the son of Louis XIV. He was the author of several controversial works, all in defense of the Roman Catholic doctrine; but his fame rests chiefly on his Sermons, which, of their kind, are of unrivaled eloquence, though they are too dramatic for the majority of English readers. Several of his compositions, written in the first instance for the use of the dauphin, and especially his Discourse on Universal History, printed in 1681, long retained a high reputation. Died, 1704.

Boswell, James, the biographer of Dr. Samuel Johnson, was born in Edinburgh, 1740. He showed early a penchant for writing and an admiration for literary men. He fell in with Johnson on a visit to London in 1763, and conceived for him the most devoted regard; made a tour with him to the Hebrides in 1773, the Journal of which he afterward published; settled in London, and was admitted to the English bar; succeeded, in 1782, to his father's estate, Auchinleck, in Ayrshire, with an income of 1,600 pounds a year. Johnson dying in 1784, Boswell's Life of him appeared seven years after, a work unique in biography, and such as no man could have written who was not a hero-worshiper to the backbone. He died in 1795.

Bosworth, Joseph, Anglo-Saxon scholar, was born in Derbyshire in 1789, and died at Oxford in 1876, having been professor of Anglo-Saxon there from 1858, and having in 1867 given 10,000 pounds toward the establishment of a professorship of Anglo-Saxon at Cambridge. His chief works were Elements of Anglo-Saxon Grammar and An Anglo-Saxon Dictionary.

Botha (bō'-tä), Rt. Hon. Louis, Boer soldier, statesman, born in 1863 at Greytown in Natal, was a member of the Transvaal Volksraad, succeeded Joubert as commander-in-chief of the Boer forces during the war, and in 1907 became prime minister of the Transvaal colony under the new constitution. In the same year he visited England, attended the British colonial conference, and received the Edinburgh LL. D. and other honors.

Botta (bŏt'-tä), Carlo Giuseppe Guglielmo, Italian historian, was born in 1766; studied medicine, and was imprisoned in 1792 as a revolutionary. He took an active part in the government of Piedmont, set up by Napoleon, but after the emperor's overthrow he devoted himself entirely to literature. He wrote The History of Italy between 1789 and 1814, and a History of the American War of Independence. Died, 1837.

Botta, Paul Emile, French archæologist and traveler, son of preceding, was born in 1802. In 1830 he went to Egypt, where he entered into the service of Mehemet Ali as a physician. The French government about 1833 appointed him consul in Alexandria, from which place he undertook a journey to Arabia, the results of which he gave to the world in a work entitled Relation d'un Voyage dans l'Yémen, entrepris 1837, pour le Muséum d'Histoire Naturelle de Paris. From Alexandria he was sent as consular agent to Mosul, where he commenced a series of discoveries which form an epoch in archæological science. In 1846 Botta was appointed consul at Jerusalem, and in 1857 at Tripoli. He returned to France in 1868, and died at Achères in 1870.

Botticelli (bŏt'-tē-chĕl'-lē), Alessandro, Italian painter, was born in 1447. In response to the invitation of Pope Sixtus IV., he went to Rome and executed some fine paintings for the chapel of the vatican. On returning to Florence he became a devoted follower of Savonarola. Died, 1515.

Bougainville (bōō'-găN'-vēl'), Louis Antoine de, French navigator, was born in Paris, 1729. In 1754 he went as secretary of the French embassy to London. In 1756 he acted as aide-de-camp to the marquis of Montcalm, to whom the defense of Canada was intrusted. He took a voyage round the world with a frigate and a St. Malo transport, the first which the French ever accomplished, which he described in his Voyage autour du monde. Died, 1814.

Boughton (bô'-tŭn), George Henry, artist, was born in England, 1834, and brought to the United States when three years old. He studied in New York, Paris, and London, and was a member of the National academy of New York, and an associate of the royal academy after 1879. Among his paintings are "The Return of the Mayflower"; "Evangeline"; "Milton visited by Andrew Marvell"; "Passing into Shade"; "Coming from Church"; "Cold Without"; "Morning Prayer"; "The Scarlet Letter"; "The Idyl of the Birds"; "Puritans Going to Church"; "Clarissa Harlowe"; etc. "The Idyl of the Birds" is generally considered his best achievement. Died, 1905.

Bouguereau (bo͞o'-gĕ-rō'), William Adolphe, French painter, was born at La Rochelle in 1825. After a youth of hardship he succeeded in reaching Paris, where he obtained admission to the studio of Picot, and later to the Beaux Arts. In 1850 he gained the prix de Rome, and went to Italy to study. His first success was "The Body of St. Cecilia Borne to the Catacombs" in the salon of 1854. From that time his reputation was made. He painted some portraits, but his subjects are chiefly ideal, idyllic, and religious. He was made a member of the institute in 1876. Died, 1905.

Bouillon (bo͞o'-yôɴ'), Godfrey de, duke of lower Lorraine, "a worthy representative of Charlemagne, from whom he was descended in the female line," was born about 1061. He gained distinction in the armies of the emperor Henry IV., and was the great leader of the first crusade. According to the chroniclers, he performed prodigies of strength and valor against the infidels, and was unanimously proclaimed king of Jerusalem on its capture in 1099, but declined the title. At Ascalon, with 20,000 men, he defeated the sultan of Egypt with 400,000. He then devoted himself to organize his government, and drew up, for his courts of justice, the assizes of Jerusalem, a code of laws which was the fullest embodiment of feudal jurisprudence. He died in 1100, and was buried on Mount Calvary. His many virtues are justly extolled in Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered.

Boulanger (bo͞o'-läɴ'-zhā'), George Ernest Jean Marie, French general and politician, was born in 1837; made colonel during the siege of Paris, general of brigade in 1880, and minister of war in 1886. He achieved great popularity, and was elected in 1889 deputy to the national assembly. A threat of prosecution drove him into exile, and he committed suicide at Brussels in 1891.

Boulger (bōl'-jer), Demetrius Charles, British historian and writer, was born in London, 1853; educated at Kensington grammar school and private tuition. Has contributed to all the leading journals on questions connected with the Indian empire, China, Egypt, and Turkey since 1876; has also closely studied military questions, especially those connected with the French frontiers and the position of Belgium; founded, in conjunction with Sir Lepel Griffin, the Asiatic Quarterly Review, 1885, and edited it during the first four and a half years of its existence. Author: England and Russia in Central Asia; The History of China; General Gordon's Letters from the Crimea; Central Asian Questions; Life of Gordon; Story of India; The Congo State; The Belgians at Waterloo; India in the 19th Century; History of Belgium; Belgian Life in Town and Country; Belgium of the Belgians.

Boulton (bōl'-tŭn), Matthew, English mechanician, born in 1728 at Birmingham. He founded the famous Soho iron and steel plant near Birmingham. One of his first inventions was a new mode of inlaying steel. He entered into partnership with James Watt, who had obtained a patent for the great improvements in the steam engine which have immortalized his name, and they established a manufactory of steam engines in 1769. They jointly contributed also to the improvement of coining machinery, and so to the perfection of the coinage itself. Died, 1809.

Bourbaki (bo͞or'-bä'-kē'), Charles Denis Sauter, French general, born at Pau, 1816, fought in the Crimea and Italy. In 1870 he commanded the imperial guard at Metz; and under Gambetta organized the army of the North, and commanded the army of the Loire. His attempt to break the Prussian line at Belfort, though ably conceived, ended in disaster; in a series of desultory attacks on a much inferior force, 1871, he lost 10,000 men. In the wretched retreat to Switzerland that followed he attempted to commit suicide. He retired in 1881 and died in 1897.

Bourbon (bo͞or'-bôɴ'), Charles, French general, known as "the constable de Bourbon," was born 1490; for his bravery at the battle of Marignano in 1515 he was made constable of France. But powerful enemies strove to undermine him in the favor of Francis I.; and, threatened with the loss of some of his lands and dignities, he renounced the service of France, and concluded a private alliance with the emperor Charles V., and with Henry VIII. of England. At the head of a force of German mercenaries he joined the Spanish army in Lombardy in 1523, and, invading France in 1524, failed at the siege of Marseilles. Next year, however, he was chief commander at the great victory of Pavia, in which Francis I. was taken prisoner. But Charles V. distrusted him, though he made him duke of Milan and Spanish commander in northern Italy. With George of Frundsberg he led the mixed army of Spanish and German mercenaries that stormed and plundered Rome in 1527. Bourbon was struck down in the fierce struggle — by a bullet said to have been fired by Benvenuto Cellini.

Bourdaloue (bo͞or'-dä'-lo͞o'), Louis, great French preacher, was born at Bourges, 1632, where, after being educated by the Jesuits for the church, he lectured in the academy for some time on humanity, theological ethics, etc. In 1669 he began to preach at St. Louis (Jesuit) church, Paris, where Louis XIV. and his granddaughter soon brought the court to hear him. His popularity lasted many years. His sermons, based chiefly on the texts of Isaiah, St. Paul, and St. Augustine, were marked by profound moral earnestness and great logical power. They were delivered with shut eyes, and a sonorous but uninflected voice. He advocated a return to primitive evangelicism, and spoke plainly about the vices of the court. He was sent on a special mission to Languedoc on the revocation of the edict of Nantes in 1685, and there is no doubt that he was best fitted among the Catholic clergy to secure a hearing from the Huguenots. His later years were spent in the preaching and practice of charity. He died at Paris in 1704.

Bourdon (bo͞or'-dôɴ'), Sébastien, French painter; born at Montpellier 1616, died 1671; studied in Paris and Rome. His first great picture was his "Martyrdom of St. Peter"; others include "Descent from the Cross," "Julius Cæsar at the Tomb of Alexander," "Group of Merchants," etc. In 1652-53 he was court painter in Sweden.

Bourget (bo͞or'-zhĕ'), Paul, French poet, critic, and novelist, member of the French academy, was born at Amiens, 1852. In 1873 he first showed his gifts as a critic, in an article contributed to the Revue des Deux Mondes, followed by a collection of poems. In this volume, and in the later effusion of his verse, as well as in his prose Studies, he showed the characteristics of his style and thought. He has written many eminently realistic and analytical books, chiefly studies of the scientific and pessimistic tendencies of the age. Among them are the following: Cosmopolis; Pastels of Men; Antigone and Other Portraits of Women; Domestic Dramas; Outre-Mer: Impressions of America; The Two Sisters; The Emigrant, etc.

Bourinot (bo͞o'-rĭ-nō'), Sir John George, Canadian author and parliamentarian, was born at Sydney, Nova Scotia, in 1837; educated at Trinity college, Toronto; established the Halifax Reporter, and in 1880 became clerk of the Dominion house of commons. His publications are numerous, dealing both with the political and the constitutional history of the Canadian dominion. Among them are How Canada is Governed; Constitutional History of Canada; Parliamentary Practice and Procedure; History of Canada (in the Story of the Nations series); and Canada Under British Rule. Died, 1902.

Bourne (bo͞orn or bôrn), Edward Gaylord, historian, educator, was born at Strykersville, N. Y., 1860; graduated at Yale, 1883; Ph. D., 1892; instructor history and lecturer on political science, Yale, 1886–88; instructor in history, Adelbert college, 1888–90; professor in history same, 1890–95; professor in history, Yale, 1895–1908. Author: Historical Introduction to the Philippine Islands, Spain in America. Editor: Fournier's Napoleon I., Roscher's Spanish Colonial System. Editor and translator: The Narrative of De Soto, The Voyages of Champlain, Narratives of Columbus and Cabot. Died, 1908.

Bourne, Hugh, founder of the Primitive Methodists, was born in 1772 at Fordhays, Stoke-upon-Trent, England, and died at Bemersley in 1852. His zeal as a Wesleyan preacher for large open-air meetings, carried on once from 6 A. M. until 8 P. M., received no countenance from the leaders of the denomination, and in 1808 he was cut off from the Wesleyan connection. But he quickly gathered round him many devoted adherents, and in 1810 a committee of ten members was formed at Standley, near Bemersley. The title of Primitive Methodists was adopted in 1812; by the people they were sometimes called Ranters. Bourne and his brother founded the first chapel of the body at Tunstall in 1811. For the greater part of his life he worked as a carpenter and builder, but found time to visit Scotland, Ireland, and the United States. He wrote a History of the Primitive Methodists.

Bourne, Jonathan, Jr., lawyer, United States senator, 1907-13, was born at New Bedford, Mass., 1855; entered Harvard college in 1873 and remained until the end of his junior year. After traveling around the world he settled in Portland, Oregon, 1878, where he read law and was admitted to the Oregon bar in 1881. He became largely interested in the mining interests of the Northwest; is president of a number of Oregon corporations and of the Bourne cotton mills at Fall River, Mass. He was a member of the Oregon legislature in 1885, 1886, and 1897. He is the author of the parcel post bill.

Boutell, Henry Sherman, lawyer, member of congress, 1897–1911; was born at Boston, Mass., 1856; moved with parents to Chicago in 1863; graduated from Northwestern university, 1874, and from Harvard university, 1876; admitted to the bar, 1879, and to the supreme court, 1886; member Illinois legislature in 1884, and introduced bill passed 1885 that is now basis of the election law of Illinois. In 1908 he placed Speaker Cannon in nomination for the presidency; is member of the board of trustees of the Northwestern university, and in 1904 received the degree of LL. D. from that institution; was elected to the fifty-fifth congress in 1897 to fill the unexpired term of Edward Dean Cooke, deceased, and was twice reëlected. Appointed United States minister to Portugal, March, 1911, to Switzerland, April, 1911.

Boutwell, George Sewall, legislator, political reformer, was born at Brookline, Mass., 1818; was self-instructed after a common school course. He began the study of law at eighteen, but never practiced. He was governor of Massachusetts 1852-53; member of congress 1863–69; secretary of the treasury 1869–73; and United States senator from Massachusetts 1873–77. He wrote Educational Topics and Institutions, and a Manual of the United States Direct and Revenue Tax. Died at Groton, Mass., 1905.

Bowditch (bou'-dĭch), Charles Pickering, trustee, archæological student; born at Boston, Mass., 1842; graduated at Harvard in 1863; director Massachusetts cotton mills, Massachusetts mills in Georgia, Pepperell manufacturing company, Saco water power company, Massachusetts hospital life insurance company. Served in civil war 1863-64; member of many archæological, historical, and other learned societies. Author of ten pamphlets on Central American archæology, and on history of the trustees of the charity of Edward Hopkins.

Bowditch, Henry Pickering, physiologist; born at Boston, 1840; graduated from Harvard, 1861; Harvard medical school, 1868; D. Sc., Cambridge, England, 1898; LL. D., Edinburgh, 1898, Toronto, 1903, university of Pennsylvania, 1904; lieutenant, captain, and major United States volunteer cavalry, 1861–65; studied physiology in France and Germany, 1868–71; assistant professor, 1871–76, and professor physiology, 1876–1906, at Harvard medical school; trustee Boston public library, 1895–1902. Published many papers on physiological subjects. Died, 1911.

Bowditch, Nathaniel, American astronomer, was born in 1773 at Salem, Mass. He showed at a very early age a great inclination for mathematics, in which he attained great proficiency, without ever attending a university. His work, The New American Practical Navigator, was received with great favor. He also published an admirable translation of La Place's Mécanique Céleste, to which he added valuable annotations. He was later chosen professor of mathematics and astronomy in Harvard college, but declined to enter the executive council of the state. Afterward became manager of the Massachusetts life insurance association, president of the mechanics' institute, and president of the academy of arts and sciences in Boston. Died, 1838.

Bowell (bou'-el), Hon. Sir Mackenzie, Canadian statesman; premier of Canadian parliament 1894-95; was born at Rickinghall, Suffolk, 1823; removed to Canada, 1833, received a common school education, and became editor and proprietor of the Belleville Intelligencer. Entered Canadian parliament, 1867; minister of customs, 1878–91; minister of militia and defense, 1891; of trade and commerce, 1892–94; president of privy council, 1895-96; elected to the senate, 1892; leader of the conservative opposition in the senate, 1896-1906.

Bowen, Francis, writer of political economy and philosophy, was born in Massachusetts in 1811; graduate of Harvard and instructor there in political economy and intellectual philosophy. In 1843 he became editor of the North American Review. In 1854 he succeeded Dr. Walker in the Alford professorship of natural religion, moral philosophy, and civil polity. His works include: Critical Essays on the History and Present Condition of Speculative Philosophy; Principles of Political Economy Applied to the Condition, Resources, and Institutions of the American People; an annotated edition of Vergil, and a revision of Reeves's translation of De Tocqueville's Democracy in America. Died, 1890.

Bowles (bōlz), Samuel, journalist, for more than thirty years editor of the Springfield Republican, was born at Springfield, Mass., 1826; died, 1878. He traveled widely over the United States and was always warmly interested in political affairs, though never holding office. As a practical editor Bowles stood in the first rank, satisfied with nothing less than the best work, sparing neither his own nor his subordinates' strength, not hampered in his work by either fear or friendship. He was an accomplished and fascinating conversationalist, cosmopolitan in taste, and liberal in opinion. He wrote Across the Continent, Our New West, and The Switzerland of America, which, with his numerous editorial writings, show him a master of clear and vigorous English.

Bowne (boun), Borden Parker, educator, writer on philosophy; was born at Leonardville, N. J., 1847; A. B., 1871, A. M., 1876, college of the city of New York; studied at universities of Halle, Paris, and Göttingen, 1873–75; LL. D., Ohio Wesleyan, 1881; assistant professor of modern languages, college of the city of New York, 1875-76; on staff New York Independent, 1875-76; professor of philosophy and dean graduate school of arts and sciences, Boston university, 1876-1910. Author: The Philosophy of Herbert Spencer; Studies in Theism; Metaphysics, Introduction to Psychological Theory; Philosophy of Theism; The Principles of Ethics; Theory of Thought and Knowledge; The Christian Revelation; The Christian Life; The Atonement; The Immanence of God; Personalism; contributed philosophical and theological articles to reviews and newspapers. Died, 1910.

Boyle, Robert, physicist, was born at Lismore castle, Ireland, 1627; after studying at Eton, and under the rector of Stalbridge, Dorset, went to the continent for six years. On his return in 1644 he found himself in possession, by his father's death, of the manor of Stalbridge, where he devoted himself to chemistry and natural philosophy. Settling at Oxford in 1654, he experimented in pneumatics, and improved the air-pump. As a director of the East India company he worked for the propagation of Christianity in the East, circulated at his own expense translations of the scriptures, and by bequest founded the "Boyle lectures" in defense of Christianity. He has justly been termed the true precursor of the modern chemist. He discovered "Mariotte's law" seven years before Mariotte. Died, 1691.

Bozzaris (bŏt'-sä-rēs) (often, bō-zăr'-ĭs), Marcos, Greek patriot who distinguished himself in the early part of the struggle for Greek independence, was born at Suli, in the mountains of Epirus, toward the close of the eighteenth century. He died in battle while successfully leading a body of 1200 men against the Turco-Albanian army, 4,000 strong, in 1823. He was honored with the title of the "Leonidas of modern Greece."

Bracton, Henry de, British ecclesiastic and jurist, was a "justice itinerant"; in 1264 he became archdeacon of Barnstaple and chancellor of Exeter cathedral, and died in 1268. His De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ was the earliest attempt at a systematic treatment of the body of English law.

Braddock, Edward, British major-general, was born in 1695; commander against the French in America in 1755; with a force of 2,000 British regulars and provincials, he moved forward to invest Fort du Quesne, now Pittsburg, Pa.; his troops, in passing through the deep forest ravine, fell into an ambuscade of Indians, while they were attacked in the front by the French, and half of them slain. The rest effected a hasty retreat under Colonel, afterward General, Washington, Braddock's aide-de-camp. Braddock, mortally wounded, was carried forty miles to where the baggage had been left, and there died.

Braddon, Mary Elizabeth (Mrs. Maxwell), popular English novelist, was born in London in 1837. In 1860 she wrote a comedietta called The Loves of Arcadia, which was brought out at the Strand theater. Her first success came with the publication, in 1862, of Lady Audley's Secret, which instantly attained popularity, and has been followed by numerous works of the same order, such as Aurora Floyd; Eleanor's Victory; Lovels of Arden; Dead Sea Fruit; Weavers and Weft; The Cloven Foot; Mount Royal; Her Convict; During Her Majesty's Pleasure, etc.

Bradford, William, one of the Pilgrims, and second governor of Plymouth colony, was born in England in 1590, died at Plymouth, Mass., 1657. He sailed from Leyden, Holland, in the Mayflower. One of his first acts, as the successor of Governor Carver, was to confirm the treaty with Massasoit, just in time to suppress a dangerous Indian conspiracy. Bradford's name is in the second patent, which conferred upon him, his "heirs, associates, and assigns," the territory named. He was governor, with some brief interruptions, for thirty-one years, but declined to serve further. He was the author of a History of Plymouth Colony from 1602 to 1647.

Bradlaugh (brăd'-lô), Charles, English politician, was born in London in 1833; in 1853 he entered a solicitor's office; he then achieved a great influence with working men as a radical, and an antagonist of the Christian religion. His lectures in the hall of science, London, on social, political, and religious questions, were very popular; and in 1860 he started the National Reformer, against which a futile government prosecution was instituted. In 1872 he published his Impeachment of the House of Brunswick. In 1880 he was elected to parliament for Northampton, but refusing to take the oath, he was not allowed to take his seat until after the general election of 1885, although he was repeatedly returned by the constituency. Afterward he earned a high reputation in the house of commons, and though a radical, opposed the advocates of socialism. In 1889 he visited India, his interest in Indian affairs having always been pronounced. Died, 1891.

Bradley, James, distinguished astronomer, was born in Gloucestershire, England, in 1693. About the time of his election as member of the royal society he became, in his twenty-ninth year, Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford; in 1727 he published his theory of the aberration of the fixed stars, containing the important discovery of the aberration of light. His next discovery was that the inclination of the earth's axis to the ecliptic is not constant, a fact including the explanation of the precession of the equinoxes and the nutation of the earth's axis, which discovery constitutes a great epoch in astronomy. Latterly he became astronomer-royal at Greenwich, and laid the foundations of modern astronomy. He died in 1762.

Bradley, William O'Connell, legislator, United States senator, was born in Garrard county, Ky., 1847; admitted to the bar, 1865, by special act of the legislature, being under twenty-one years of age; in 1872 presidential elector and candidate for congress, and again candidate for congress, 1876; defeated; delegate at large republican national conventions, 1880, 84, 88, 92, 1900, 04. Four times nominated United States senator; unsuccessful candidate for governor, 1887; appointed minister to Corea, 1889, and declined; first republican governor of Kentucky, 1895–99; elected to United States senate for term, 1909–15.

Brady, Cyrus Townsend, Protestant Episcopal clergyman, author; born at Allegheny, Pa., 1861; graduate of United States naval academy, 1883. Railroad service with the Missouri Pacific and Union Pacific roads for several years; studied theology; ordained deacon, 1889; priest, 1890. Was rector of Protestant Episcopal churches in Missouri and Colorado and archdeacon of Kansas until 1895, and archdeacon of Pennsylvania until 1899; rector of St. Paul's church, Overbrook, Philadelphia, 1899–1902, resigning to engage in literary work; chaplain of 1st Pennsylvania volunteer infantry in Spanish-American war. Author: For Love of Country; For the Freedom of the Sea; The Grip of Honor; Stephen Decatur; Recollections of a Missionary in the Great West; American Fights and Fighters; Commodore Paul Jones; Reuben James; When Blades are Out and Love's Afield; Under Tops'ls and Tents; Colonial Fights and Fighters; Hohenzollern; Woven With the Ship; In the Wasp's Nest; The Conquest of the Southwest; The Two Captains; etc.

Brady, Mrs. W. A. See George, Grace.

Bragg, Braxton, American general, born in Warren county, N. C., 1817, served with distinction under General Taylor in the Mexican war, and retired to private life in 1859. He became a brigadier-general in the confederate army in 1861, and succeeded General Beauregard in command of the army in Mississippi, with the rank of general, May, 1862. He fought against General Buell a severe and indecisive battle at Perryville; against General Rosecrans the sanguinary battle of Stone river; inflicted a defeat on the army of Rosecrans at Chickamauga; was defeated by General Grant at Chattanooga, and, at his own request, was relieved of his command and appointed chief-of-staff to Jefferson Davis. Died, 1876.

Brahe (brä; Dan. brä'-ĕ), Tycho, Danish astronomer, was born at Knudstrup, 1546; studied at Copenhagen, was sent by his uncle to Leipzig in 1562 to attend the law classes; but astronomy had greater attractions for him, and on his uncle's death he devoted himself wholly to this science. After spending some years in travel, he returned to his native country, and soon obtained the patronage of the king, who subsequently built for his use a commodious observatory called Uraniborg on the island of Hven, in the sound. On the death of the king in 1588, Brahe's position was changed, and in 1597 he was forced to leave the country. Having obtained the protection of Emperor Rudolph II., he settled at Prague, where he died in 1601. The great merit of Brahe as an astronomer lies in the rare industry and assiduity with which he observed and recorded the position of stars and planets, and it was partly due to these observations that Kepler was led to the conception of his three famous laws.

Brahms (bräms), Johannes, German musical composer, was born at Hamburg, 1833. Schumann early expressed the highest opinion of Brahms's genius, but for many years he was not appreciated in Germany. In 1861 he went to Vienna, where he acquired a high reputation, and held several important musical posts. In 1868 he composed the Deutsches Requiem, which, after the Franco-German war, was performed throughout Germany. His compositions have been very highly valued. Died, 1897.

Bramante (brä-män'-tā), the assumed name of Donato Lazzari, celebrated Italian architect, born near Urbino in 1444. He was employed at Rome by Popes Alexander VI. and Julius II., for the latter of whom he planned, and partly executed, the buildings connecting the Belvedere and the vatican, and subsequently designed the great church of St. Peter's, completed by Michaelangelo. Bramante first introduced Raphael at the court of Rome. Died, 1514.

Brande (brănd), William Thomas, English chemist, born at London, 1788, died in 1866, having become an F. R. S. in 1809, professor of chemistry to the Apothecaries' company in 1812, Davy's successor at the royal institution in 1813, and head of the coinage department of the mint in 1854. He published a Manual of Chemistry, a Dictionary of Materia Medica, and a Dictionary of Science and Art.

Brandegee, Frank Bosworth, lawyer, United States senator, was born at New London, Conn., 1864; graduated from Yale in 1885; was admitted to the bar in 1888; became a member of the law firm of Brandegee, Kenealy & Brennan. In 1888 he was a representative in the Connecticut general assembly, and for ten years was corporation counsel of the city of New London; speaker of the Connecticut house of representatives in 1899; in 1902 he was elected a representative to the second session of the fifty-seventh congress to fill a vacancy, and was reëlected to the fifty-eighth and fifty-ninth congresses. He was elected United States senator for an unexpired term in 1905, and reëlected in 1909.

Brandes (brăn'-dĕs), George, literary critic, was born of Jewish parentage, 1842, in Copenhagen, where he graduated at the university in 1864. Several æsthetic and philosophic books raised a charge of scepticism, which was not removed by his lectures on The Great Tendencies of Nineteenth-century Literature. His Danish Poets appeared in 1877; and the same year he left Denmark, and settled in Berlin, where he wrote lives of Lassalle, Tegner, and Beaconsfield. A lecture tour through Norway and Denmark brought a powerful party to his side. Among his works are French Romanticism; Ludvig Holberg; Impressions of Poland; Impressions of Russia; Shakespeare (translation); Main Currents of Nineteenth-century Literature; Recollections of My Childhood and Youth, etc.

Brandl, Alois, professor of English philology in the university of Berlin since 1895; born at Innsbruck, Tyrol, 1855; educated at Innsbruck; Ph. D. of Vienna; LL. D., Philadelphia; studied in Berlin and London. Privat-docent in the university of Vienna, 1881–84; extraordinary professor in the German university of Prague, 1884–88; ordinary professor in the university of Göttingen, 1888–92; of Strassburg, 1892–95; member of Berlin Akademie, 1904. Author of Middle English Literature, Shakspere, Schlegel-Tieck's Shakespeare, etc.

Branner, John Casper, vice-president, 1899-1913, president since 1913, Leland Stanford Jr. university, Cal.; associate editor Journal of Geology; born at New Market, Tenn., 1850; graduated from Cornell university, 1874; member imperial geological commission, Brazil, 1875–77; agent United States department of agriculture in Brazil, 1882-83; geological survey of Pennsylvania, 1883–85; professor of geology, university of Indiana, 1885–92; state geologist of Arkansas, 1887-93; director of the Branner-Agassiz expedition to Brazil, 1899; professor geology, 1892-1913, Leland Stanford Jr. university; president geological society of America, 1904; member of the national academy of sciences, Washington; has published numerous works on the geology of Brazil and Arkansas.

Brant, Joseph, Indian chief of the Mohawk nation, was born in Ohio about 1742; held a commission in the British service, and fought against the American colonists in the revolution. He afterward went to England, where he published the Gospel of St. Mark in Mohawk. He died in 1807.

Brashear (brăsh'-ĕr), John A., manufacturer of astronomical and physical instruments; was born at Brownsville, Pa., 1840; public school education; Sc. D., Western university of Pennsylvania; LL. D., Washington and Jefferson college, university of Wooster. Learned machinist's trade; at thirty began the construction of astronomical instruments; acting director Allegheny observatory, 1898-1900; now acting chancellor Western university of Pennsylvania; member of many scientific societies.

Brassey, Thomas, English engineer and railroad contractor, was born in 1805 at Baerton, Cheshire, England; died in 1870. After receiving an ordinary education he was, at the age of sixteen years, apprenticed to a surveyor, whom he succeeded in business. After building part of the Grand Junction and the London and Southampton railroads, he contracted, 1840, in partnership with another, to build the railroad from Paris to Rouen. In a few years he held under contract, in England and France, some ten railroads, involving a capital of $180,000,000, and employing 75,000 men. In partnership with Betts and Peto he undertook the Grand Trunk of Canada, 1,100 miles in length, including the great bridge at Montreal. His army of men were employed in nearly every part of Europe, South America, Australia, India, etc. He amassed great wealth, but continued to be generous to the needy, and modest and simple in his tastes and manners.

Brassey, Thomas, Lord, English political economist and authority on seamanship, was born at Stafford in 1836, son of Thomas Brassey, the great contractor; educated at Rugby and at Oxford; he entered English political life in 1865; was civil lord of the admiralty 1880–84; secretary to the admiralty 1884-85; governor of Victoria, Australia, 1895–1900. He is known as an enthusiastic yachtsman, interested in the British seamen, a writer on the British navy, and in 1893–95 was president of the institute of naval architects. His chief writings are a treatise on Work and Wages; The Eastern Question; Foreign Work and British Wages; The British Navy (in 5 vols.), and Sixty Years of Progress.

Author: Reading Journey Through Chautauqua.

Brazza (brät'-sä), Pierre Savorgnan de, explorer, was born of Italian descent at Rio de Janeiro in 1852. He entered the French navy in 1870, served on the Gaboon, and in 1876–78 explored the Ogowe. In 1878 the French government gave him 100,000 francs to explore the country north of the Congo, where he secured vast grants of land for France, and founded several stations —that of Brazzaville on the northern shore of Stanley pool. In 1883 he returned, largely subsidized by the French government, and by 1886 he had established twenty-six stations. He continued to explore until 1897, being in 1888-97 governor of French Congo. He died in 1905.

Breckinridge, John Cabell, American politician, was born in Kentucky in 1821; entered congress in 1851, and in 1856 was elected vice-president under Buchanan. In 1860 he was a candidate for the presidency in the Southern interest, but was defeated by Lincoln; denounced Lincoln's address as a declaration of war, and was expelled from the house of representatives. He became United States senator in 1861, was given a command in the confederate army, and rose to the rank of major-general. In 1865 he was confederate secretary of war. Died, 1875.

Brian Boroihme (brī'-an bō-roim'), or Brian Boru (bō-rōō'), king of Ireland, was born 926; ascended the throne of both munsters — answering to Tipperary and Clare — in 978. Some time afterward he became supreme ruler of Ireland. King Brian supported a rude but princely estate at Kincora, and he had also seats at Tara and Cashel. The vigor of his reign brought prosperity to his country. He defeated the Danes in upward of twenty pitched battles, restricting their influence to the four cities of Dublin, Wexford, Waterford, and Limerick. In the battle of Clontarf, 1014, in which he was killed, he gained a signal victory over a united army of revolted natives and Danes, the power of the latter receiving a shock from which it never recovered.

Bridgewater, Duke of (Francis Egerton), styled the "father of British inland navigation," was born in 1736, died in 1803. In 1758–60 he obtained acts of parliament for making a navigable canal from Worsley to Salford, Lancashire, and carrying it over the Mersey and Irwell navigation at Barton by an aqueduct thirty-nine feet above the surface of the water, and 200 yards long, thus forming a communication between his coal mines at Worsley and Manchester on one level. In this undertaking he was aided by the skill of James Brindley, the celebrated engineer. He was also a liberal promoter of the grand trunk navigation; and the impulse he thus gave to the internal navigation of England led to the extension of the canal system throughout the kingdom.

Bright, John, eminent orator and radical statesman, was born of Quaker parentage, 1811; he entered his father's business at the age of sixteen. Though he had taken part in the reform movement, he first became prominent along with his friend Cobden in the anti-corn law agitation; entered parliament for Durham, being afterward returned from Manchester, and losing that seat through his opposition to the Crimean war. In 1857 he was returned for Birmingham, holding that seat until his death. He joined Gladstone's government which disestablished the Irish church, but opposed his home rule policy in 1886, dying in the unshaken conviction that it was a fatal error. As a master of really pure Saxon English, in all its power and pathos, Bright was never surpassed, and his speeches are worthy of attentive study on that account alone. Died, 1889.

Bright, Richard, English physician, was born 1789, died 1858; educated at Edinburgh; practiced with great success in London. His specialty was morbid anatomy and the connection between morbid symptoms and alterations of structure of the internal organs. He discovered that an albuminous condition of the urine, accompanied with dropsical effusions, is often dependent on a peculiar degeneration of the kidneys, whence the disease in which these conditions occur was called "Bright's disease." His publications on this topic were made in 1836–40.

Brinton, Daniel Garrison, American ethnologist, was born at Thornbury, Pa., 1837, and died at Atlantic City, N. J., 1899. Brontë (brŏn'-tĕ), Charlotte, English authoress, was born at Thornton, 1816, died 1855; she was the eldest of the three Brontë sisters. After some experience as a governess she engaged with her sisters in the writing of novels, and in 1846 published with them a small volume of poems under the names of Currer, Ellis, and Acton Bell. In 1847 she published the well-known story, Jane Eyre. Its success was instantaneous and complete. Although adversely and severely criticised, it was and is admitted to be one of the most remarkable of English novels. Her second story, Shirley, was published in 1849, and her third and last, Villette, in 1853. Another story, The Professor, which had been refused by the publisher before Jane Eyre had made its author famous, was published after her death. In 1854 she married Rev. Mr. Nicholls, but soon after her marriage died of consumption in her fortieth year.

He was celebrated as a pulpit orator, and as a vigorous and independent thinker. His freedom from the ordinary sectarian trammels, his liberal views of doctrine, with his profound convictions as to vital Christian truths, and his deeply spiritual, yet intensely practical preaching gave him great popular power. He died in 1893.

Brougham (broo͞'-am or broo͞m), Henry Peter, Lord Brougham and Vaux, British jurist, philosopher, and statesman, was born at Edinburgh, 1778. After graduating at Edinburgh university he was called to the Scottish bar, and became one of the editors of the Edinburgh Review. In 1808 he joined the English bar, and speedily acquired high reputation as an advocate. In 1810 he entered parliament, where he became a chief of the liberal party. In 1820-21 he was engaged as attorney-general for Queen Caroline, and succeeded in obtaining her acquittal. In 1830 he became the acknowledged champion of parliamentary reform, was called to the house of peers, and appointed lord high chancellor of England, which office he resigned in 1834. He devoted the remainder of his life almost exclusively to science and literature at his château at Cannes, France. He was one of the foremost men of his age and country, and his fame rests principally upon his exertions and achievements in the cause of popular education and political and legal reform. Died, 1868.

Brown, John, leader of the Harper's Ferry insurrection, 1859, designed to incite the slaves of the southern states to rebellion, was descended from a Puritan carpenter, one of the Mayflower emigrants, and was born at Torrington, Conn., in 1800. In 1855 he went to Kansas. After the slavery agitation in that state was settled by a general vote, he traveled through the southern and eastern states, declaiming against slavery, and endeavoring to organize an armed attack upon it. In 1859, at the head of seventeen white men and five blacks, he commenced active hostilities by a descent upon Harper's Ferry, where an arsenal was located containing from 100,000 to 200,000 stand of arms. The arsenal was easily captured, and forty or fifty of the principal inhabitants were made prisoners; but instead of retreating to the mountains with arms and hostages, as his original design had been, Brown lingered in the town until evening, by which time 1,500 militiamen had arrived. He was captured, tried for treason, and executed in 1859.

Browne, Charles Farrar, American humorist and satirist, known by the pseudonym of "Artemus Ward," was born at Waterford, Maine, 1834. His first literary effort was as showman to an imaginary traveling menagerie. He traveled over America lecturing, carrying with him a whimsical panorama as affording texts for his numerous jokes, which he took with him to London, and exhibited with the same accompaniment with unbounded success. He spent some time among the Mormons, and defined their religion as singular, but their wives plural. He died in England in 1867.

Browne, Sir Thomas, English physician and author, was born at London in 1605. After studying at Winchester, Oxford, and on the continent, he settled as a physician at Norwich, where he spent the rest of his life. During the civil wars and the protectorate he remained in learned seclusion, indifferent to either party. He was knighted in 1671, and died on his birthday in 1682. His chief works are Religio Medici; Pseudodoxia Epidemica, or Inquiry into Vulgar and Common Errors; Hydriotaphia, or the Urn Burial, and The Garden of Cyrus. De Quincey ranks Browne with Jeremy Taylor as the richest and most dazzling of rhetoricians.

Browning, Elizabeth Barrett, English poet, was born at Durham in 1806, died at Florence, Italy, 1861. Her first important essay in authorship was a translation of the Prometheus of Æschylus in 1833. In 1838 appeared the Seraphim, and Other Poems. In 1846 she married Robert Browning. In 1850 Mrs. Browning published her collected works, together with several new poems. In 1851 appeared the Casa Guidi Windows, a poem whose theme was the struggle made by the Tuscans for freedom in 1849. Aurora Leigh, her longest production, was published in 1856. Poems Before Congress appeared in 1860. Her poetry is distinguished by its depth of feeling and generous sentiment.

He organized the first Egyptian university, was an eminent authority on Egyptian archæology, and wrote many works covering many phases of that subject. He was later known by his title of Brugsch Bey. Died, 1894.

Brummel, George Bryan, "Beau Brummel," was born at London in 1778; in his day the prince of dandies, was patronized by the prince of Wales, afterward George IV.; quarreled with the prince; fled from his creditors to Calais, where, reduced to destitution, he lived some years in the same reckless fashion. He settled at length in Caen, where he died insane in 1840.

Brunelleschi (brōō′-nĕl-lĕs′-kē), Filippo, great Italian architect, was born at Florence in 1377, is reckoned the first who established on a sound basis the theory of perspective. When still a young man he went to Rome, where he acquired a profound knowledge of ancient architecture. In 1407 he returned to Florence. In 1420 it was proposed to complete the structure of the cathedral of St. Maria del Fiore, founded in 1296, and then only wanting a dome. The work was intrusted to him, and finished, with the exception of the lantern, with which he intended to crown the whole, but was prevented by his death in 1446. Brunelleschi's dome, measured diametrically, is the largest in the world, and served as a model to Michaelangelo for that of St. Peter's.

Brunhilde (brün'-hĕld') (Brunehaut), daughter of the Visigothic king, Athanagild; married King Sigebert of Austrasia in 561, and was afterward regent for her two grandsons, Theodebert II., king of Austrasia, and Theodoric II., king of Burgundy; divided the government of the whole Frankish world with her rival Fredegond, who governed Neustria for the youthful Clotaire II. On Fredegond's death in 598 she seized Neustria, and for a while united under her rule the whole Merovingian dominions, but was overthrown in 613 by the Austrasian nobles under Clotaire II., and put to death by being dragged at the heels of a wild horse.

Bruno (brōō'-nō), Giordano, a restless speculative thinker, was born at Nola, near Naples, in 1548, was trained a Dominican, but doubting the dogmas, fled to Geneva, whence Calvinist suspicion of his scepticism drove him to Paris, where he lectured. Here the zeal of the orthodox Aristotelians forced him to withdraw to London in 1583, and Oxford, where he repeatedly gave lectures. In 1585 he was in Paris again, in 1586 in Wittenberg, in 1588 in Prague, then in Helmstedt, Frankfort, Padua; and in 1592 in Venice he was arrested by the officers of the inquisition and conveyed to Rome in 1593. There, in 1600, he was burned as an obstinate heretic. Of his works (mostly written in Italian), the most famous is the Spaccio della Bestia Trionfante.

Bruno, Saint, founder of the Carthusian order, was born at Cologne about 1040; became rector of the cathedral school at Rheims, but, oppressed by the wickedness of his time, withdrew in 1084 to the wild mountain of Chartreuse, near Grenoble. Here with six friends he founded the austere Carthusians. In 1094 he established a second Carthusian monastery at Della Torre in Calabria, where he died, 1101.

Brush, George Jarvis, mineralogist; born in Brooklyn, 1831; private school education; studied chemistry and mineralogy at New Haven; in 1850, went to Louisville as assistant to Prof. Silliman in university there; received after examination newly created degree of Ph. B., Yale, 1852; LL. D., Harvard, 1886. Assistant in chemistry, university of Virginia, 1852-53; studied in Europe, 1853–56; professor metallurgy, 1855–71, Yale (now Sheffield) scientific school; professor mineralogy same 1864–98; director Sheffield scientific school, 1872–98; was member of many scientific societies at home and abroad. Wrote extensively on mineral topics. Died, 1912.

Brutus, Lucius Junius, figures in the history of early Rome as the hero who overturned the monarchial, and established the republican form of government. That his character as a stern old Roman hero might be complete, the legend adds that he sacrificed to the new republic his own sons, detected in a conspiracy to restore the monarchy. He fell in mortal combat against the Tarquins about 507 B. C.

Brutus, Marcus Junius, was born in 85 B. C., and died 42 B. C. He joined Pompey in his war against Cæsar; but after Pompey's defeat he was kindly treated by Cæsar, and made governor of Cisalpine Gaul. In 44 B. C., in his eagerness to preserve the liberty of the republic against Cæsar's apparent purpose of being made emperor, he was persuaded by Caius Cassius to join a conspiracy, and helped in his assassination, although Cæsar had given him many honors and promised him others. The people, instead of rejoicing at Cæsar's death, were enraged, and Brutus fled from Rome. Soon after, he and Cassius were defeated at Philippi by Antony and Octavius. Feeling their cause was lost, Brutus flung himself upon his sword and died. He was an earnest student, and something of a philosopher.

Bryan, William Jennings, cabinet officer, editor, orator; born in Salem, Ill., 1860; early education in public schools and Whipple academy; graduate of Illinois college, Jacksonville, 1881; Union college of law, Chicago, 1883. Practiced at Jacksonville, Ill., 1883–87, then at Lincoln, Neb.; member of congress, 1891–95; received democratic vote for United States senator in Nebraska legislature, 1893; nominated in democratic convention for United States senator, 1894, but was defeated in legislature by John M. Thurston; editor of Omaha World-Herald, 1894–96; delegate to national democratic convention, 1896; wrote the "silver plank" in its platform, made a notable speech, and was nominated for president of United States; traveled over 18,000 miles during campaign, speaking at almost every stopping place; received 176 electoral votes against 271 for William McKinley. In 1897-98 he lectured on bimetallism; raised in May, 1898, the 3d regiment of Nebraska volunteer infantry for war against Spain, becoming its colonel. Nominated for president in 1900 by democratic, populist, and silver republican conventions; he made an active canvass, but was again defeated by William McKinley; after the election he established a weekly political magazine, The Commoner. He was again nominated for president in 1908, and, after a notable campaign, was defeated by W. H. Taft. Was appointed secretary of state, 1913. Author: The First Battle, Under Other Flags, The Old World and Its Ways, and many articles in magazines and newspapers.

Bryant, William Cullen, poet and journalist, born at Cummington, Hampshire county, Mass., 1794. At the age of ten he published translations from the Latin poets; at thirteen he wrote a terse and vigorous political poem entitled The Embargo; and at eighteen he composed his Thanatopsis. He established The New York Review, to which he contributed many of his best poems. In 1826 he became principal editor of The Evening Post, a leading paper of New York, which he conducted with manliness and purity of tone. The first collected edition of his poems appeared in 1832. They were soon after republished in England, and were regarded as the highest effort, up to that time, of the American muse. In 1842 he published The Fountain, and Other Poems. He visited Europe in 1834, and several times afterward, and records his observations in Letters of a Traveler in Europe and America. In 1858 appeared a new edition of his poetical works, and in 1870 a metrical translation of the Iliad, followed in 1871 by that of the Odyssey.

He afterward collaborated in writing the History of the United States. Died, 1878.

Bucer (bo͝ot′-sẽr or bū′-sẽr), or Butzer, Martin, German reformer, was born in 1491 at Schlettstadt, in Alsace; at fourteen entered the Dominican order, and went to Heidelberg to study theology, Greek, and Hebrew. In 1521 he quitted the order, and was appointed chaplain to the elector-palatine. He married a former nun in 1522, and next year settled in Strassburg. In the disputes between Luther and Zwingli, Bucer adopted a middle course. At the diet of Augsburg he declined to subscribe to the proposed confession of faith. He was professor of theology at Cambridge, England, after 1549, where he died, 1551.

Buchanan (bŭ-kăn′-an or bū-kăn′-an), James, fifteenth president of the United States, was born in Pennsylvania, 1791; admitted to the bar, 1812; member of congress, 1821–31; minister to Russia, 1831–33; United States senator, 1834-45; secretary of state, 1845–49; minister to England, 1853–56; signed Ostend manifesto, 1854; president, 1857–61. In his last message, President Buchanan censured the northern people for the imminent disruption of the Union, holding that neither the executive nor congress had power to coerce a state. He spent the remainder of his life at his home in Lancaster, Pa. In 1866 he wrote a book to defend his administration. He died in 1868.

Buchanan, Robert, British poet and critic, was born in England, 1841; educated at Glasgow university. In 1860 he published Undertones, a volume of verses; in 1865 Idylls and London Poems. In 1866 he edited Wayside Posies, and translated ballads from the Danish. Among later works are Napoleon Fallen — a lyrical drama; God and the Man; The Wandering Jew; The City of Dreams; The Shadow of the Sword; Woman and the Man; Master Spirits; A Mad Prince; St. Abe and His Seven Wives. Died, 1901.

Buckingham (bŭk′-ĭng-am), George Villiers, Duke of, the favorite of James I. and Charles I. of England, born at Brooksby, Leicestershire, 1592. In 1623, while negotiations were in progress with the Spanish court for a marriage between the infanta and the prince of Wales, afterward Charles I., Buckingham persuaded the latter to go himself to Madrid and prosecute his suit in person. By his advice James declared war against Spain. On the accession of Charles I., in 1625, Buckingham maintained his ascendency at court, but after the ill-fated expedition against Cadiz he became odious to the nation. He was assassinated by a discontented subaltern officer named Felton, 1628.

Buckle, Henry Thomas, English historian, was born at Lee, Kent, 1821, the son of a London shipowner. A sickly child, he was for a very short time at an academy in Kentish-Town; no other school and no university claims credit for his education, which yet was liberal in the highest degree. In 1840 he found himself master of 1,500 pounds a year; by 1850 he knew eighteen foreign languages, and had amassed a library of 22,000 volumes, chosen mostly to help him in a magnum opus, of which all that was ever published was but a fragment, An Introduction to the History of Civilization in England. His health was shattered by the loss of an idolized mother; and in 1862, after six months' wandering in Egypt and Palestine, he died of typhoid fever at Damascus.

Buckley, James Monroe, clergyman, editor New York Christian Advocate, 1880-1912; born in Rahway, N. J., 1836; educated at Pennington, N. J., seminary, and one year at Wesleyan university; M. A., D. D., Giessen, 1883. He served as volunteer in the 74th regiment of infantry in the Franco-German war of 1870 during the siege of Metz; passed the two examinations for church service at Coblenz in 1871 and 1874; became privat-docent of old testament theology in the university of Bonn in 1873; was inspector of the Evangelisch-theologisches Stift at Bonn, 1878–85; professor extraordinarius in 1879 at Bonn; 1889 at Strassburg, received a call as professor ordinarius to Zürich, and was promoted the same year to the professorship at Strassburg; accepted a call to Marburg in 1900. He has published many works on historical and critical theology.

Buddha (bo͝od′-ȧ) (Gautama). See page 201.

Budge, Ernest A. Wallis, English archæologist, keeper of Egyptian and Assyrian antiquities, British museum, was born in Cornwall, 1857; educated at Christ's college, Cambridge. Has conducted excavations at Aswan in Egypt, at Gebel Barkal, on the island of Meroe, at Semna and other sites in the Sudan, and at Nineveh and Der in Mesopotamia. Author of Babylonian Life and History; Egyptian Ideas of the Future Life; Egyptian Magic; Easy Lessons in Egyptian Hieroglyphics; The Egyptian Sudan, its History and Monuments, 2 vols.; The Sarcophagus of Seti I.; The Book of the Kings of Egypt, 2 vols.; and numerous others on oriental subjects.

Buffon (bü'-fôɴ'), Georges Louis Leclerc, Count de, French naturalist, was born 1707, died 1788. He was educated for the law; but, after traveling for a time, devoted himself to science. In 1739 he was elected a member of the academy of sciences, and appointed director of the royal garden. His Natural History, in fifteen volumes, is written in the finest literary style and created a great popular interest in natural history. Rousseau is said to have kissed the steps of the pavilion in which the book was written. He was one of the pioneers of the modern doctrine of evolution. The History of Birds, History of Minerals, and Epochs of Nature are other works of his which are well known.

Bulfinch, Charles, American architect, was born in Boston, Mass., 1763. His chief works are the Massachusetts state house, at Boston; McLean hospital, Somerville; Massachusetts general hospital, Boston; and the west porticos of the capitol at Washington. He died 1844.

Bulkeley, Morgan Gardner, ex-United States senator, was born at East Haddam, Conn., 1838; educated in the district schools of his native town and at the Hartford high school; hon. M. A., Yale, 1889. In 1852 commenced a business life in Brooklyn, N. Y.; in 1862 enlisted in the thirteenth regiment, national guard state of New York, and served at Baltimore and Suffolk, Va., under the command of Brigadier-general Max Weber; returned to Hartford in 1872, and at once became actively interested in its business and politics; organized and was the first president of the United States bank of Hartford, and in 1879 was chosen president of the Ætna life insurance company, organized by his father; governor of Connecticut from 1889 until 1893; was elected to the United States senate for the term 1905–11.

Bull, Ole Bornemann, famous violinist; born in Bergen, in Norway, 1810; he secured great triumphs both throughout Europe and in America by his wonderful playing. He lost all his money in a scheme to found a colony of his countrymen in Pennsylvania, and had to take again to his violin to repair his broken fortunes. He afterward settled down at Cambridge, Mass., and had also a summer residence in Norway, where he died in 1880.

Buller (bŏŏl'-lẽr), Sir Redvers, British general, was born in England in 1839, and as an officer of the 60th rifles saw much service in the China expedition of 1860, in the Red River rebellion in northwestern Canada, in Ashanti, and in the Kaffir and Zulu wars in South Africa. In the Boer war, 1899–1901, he had chief command of the first army corps sent from England to South Africa. The Boer opposition on the Tugela was of the most formidable character; after many reverses he effected the relief of Ladysmith. He was successively adjutant-general, lieutenant-general, and commander-in-chief of the British forces. Retired, 1901; died, 1908.

Bülow (bü'-lō), Prince Bernhard von, German statesman, chancellor of the empire 1900–09, was born at Klein-Flottbeck in 1849. He entered the German foreign office in 1873, and acted as secretary of embassy in Rome, St. Petersburg, and Vienna, holding the important post of chargé d'affaires to Greece during the Russo-Turkish war. At the conclusion of that war he was appointed one of the secretaries of the Berlin congress, and after more diplomatic service in Paris and St. Petersburg, he was appointed minister to Roumania 1888, and ambassador to Italy, 1893. During 1897 he acted as foreign secretary while Baron von Marschall was on leave, and was at last definitely appointed to that office. In 1899 he concluded the treaty with Spain, whereby the Caroline, Marianne, and Pelew islands were ceded to Germany, and upon this achievement he was created Count Bülow. In 1900, on the resignation of Prince Hohenlohe, he succeeded him as chancellor of the German empire, prime minister and minister of foreign affairs of Prussia, and, on June 6, 1905, he was raised to the dignity of prince. He resigned the chancellorship in 1909, and was succeeded by Dr. Bethmann-Hollweg.

Bülow, Friedrich Wilhelm, Baron von, Prussian general, was born at Falkenberg, 1755, died at Königsberg, 1816; in 1813 commanded in the first successful encounter with the French at Möckern, and revived the self-confidence of the army after the adverse battle of Lützen. His victories over Oudinot and Ney at Grossbeeren and Dennewitz saved Berlin; he acted a conspicuous part in the battle of Leipzig, and, by taking possession of Montmartre, finished the campaign of 1814. The king gave him an estate worth 30,000 pounds, and the title of Graf von Dennewitz. In 1815 he joined Blücher by forced marches, and headed the column that first came to Wellington's aid at Waterloo.

Bulwer (bŏŏl'-wẽr), Edward George Earle Lytton. See Lytton, Lord.

Bulwer, Sir Henry Lytton Earle, famous English diplomatist and author, an elder brother of Lord Lytton, usually known as Sir Henry Bulwer, was born 1801. In 1837 he became secretary of embassy at Constantinople, where he negotiated and concluded a treaty which is the foundation of the present commercial system of England in the East. In 1843 he was made minister plenipotentiary to the court of Madrid, and concluded the peace between Spain and Morocco in the following year. In 1849 he came to Washington, where he evinced equal art in concluding the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. In 1852 he was sent to Tuscany as envoy extraordinary, and in 1856 was nominated by Lord Palmerston commissioner at Bucharest for investigating the state of the Danubian principalities; died 1872. Among his works are An Autumn in Greece; France: Social, Literary, and Political; Life of Byron and Historical Characters.

Bunsen (bŏŏn'-sen), Baron, Christian Karl Josias, German statesman and scholar, born 1791 at Korbach, in the principality of Waldeck, died at Bonn, 1860. In 1841 he was sent on a special mission to London, to negotiate the erection of an Anglo-Prussian bishopric in Jerusalem, and was shortly afterward appointed ambassador at the English court. His views regarding the part Prussia should act in the Eastern question not being in accordance with those of his court, he resigned in 1854. He is known in literature by his Constitution of the Church of the Future, Christianity and Mankind, God in History, and many other works.

Bunsen, Robert Wilhelm, German chemist, was born at Göttingen, 1811. He was the first to produce magnesium in large quantities, and in 1860 invented the magnesium light, which has proved so important to photography. His greatest discovery was that of spectrum analysis, made in conjunction with Kirchhoff. Bunsen will always be remembered by physicists and chemists from their constant use of the photometer and gas-burner, which are such useful adjuncts to laboratory apparatus, and which bear the "Bunsen burner" name. Died, 1899.

Bunyan, John, English writer, was born at Elstow, near Bedford, in 1628. For some years he followed his father's trade, that of a traveling tinker. After a short service in the parliamentary army, he married at the age of nineteen. His marriage was followed by his conversion, or religious "awakening." In 1655 he became a member of the Baptist congregation at Bedford, and, subsequently, its pastor. After the restoration, he was convicted under the act against conventicles, 1660, and thrown into Bedford jail, where he remained for upward of eleven years, supporting his family by making tagged laces, and writing the Pilgrim's Progress. Through the interposition of Dr. Barlow, bishop of Lincoln, he was released from prison, 1672, becoming again pastor of the Bedford congregation. This position he held till his death, which took place, in London, 1688. Of Bunyan's other works, the chief are his Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners, an autobiography, and the Holy War, another allegory, very inferior, however, to the Pilgrim's Progress. He is also the author of a volume of verse, entitled Divine Emblems.

Burbank, Luther, naturalist, horticulturist; born in Lancaster, Mass., 1849; boyhood on farm; educated at Lancaster academy; always devoted to study of nature, especially plant life. Moved to Santa Rosa, Cal., 1875; conducts Burbank's experiment farms. Burdett-Coutts (bûr-dĕt'-ko͞ots'), Angela Georgina, Baroness, English philanthropist, was born in 1814, the daughter of Sir Francis Burdett; succeeded in 1837 to the great wealth of her grandfather, Thomas Coutts. The shoeblack brigade, the Nova Scotia gardens, model lodging houses, and Columbia market are of her foundation. The poor and distressed at home and abroad had a constant benefactress in her; the east-end weavers, the Irish fishermen of Cape Clear, the Turkish peasantry after the Russo-Turkish war are among those who received her help. In 1871 the queen made Miss Coutts a peeress, and in 1881 the baroness married William Ashmead-Bartlett. She died in 1906.

Burdette (bûr-dĕt'), Robert Jones, American journalist, humorist, and lecturer, was born in Pennsylvania in 1844. Served with the 47th Illinois volunteers as a private, in the civil war, and was for a time connected with the Peoria Transcript; later became associate editor of the Burlington (Iowa) Hawkeye, and of the Brooklyn Eagle; his humorous sketches won him an audience far and wide. He began to lecture in 1876, and was licensed a minister of the Baptist church, 1887; held a pastorate at Los Angeles until 1909, when he was incapacitated by an accident. He is the author of Hawkeyetems; The Rise and Fall of the Moustache; Hawkeyes; Life of William Penn; Innach Garden; Sons of Asaph; Chimes from a Jester's Bells; Smiles Yoked with Sighs; etc.

Burgoyne (bûr-goin'), John, British general, was born 1722; entered early into the army; and in 1762 displayed much talent and enterprise in command of a party of the British troops in Portugal. In the American war, he led the army which was to penetrate from Canada into the revolting provinces. At first, he was successful; but was ultimately compelled to surrender at Saratoga, 1777. Disgusted by the conduct of the ministry after his return, he resigned all his employments. He died in 1792.

Burke, Edmund, British statesman and orator, was born at Dublin in 1729; graduated at Trinity college, Dublin. Going to London, he attracted attention by his essays on the Sublime and Beautiful, and devoted himself to literature, founding in 1759 The Annual Register. In 1761 he became private secretary to Hamilton, the new chief secretary for Ireland; and served Lord Rockingham in the same capacity when that nobleman became prime minister; in 1766 entered parliament; his speeches on American affairs created a great sensation in the house of commons. His position in political life was raised still higher by the pamphlets which he wrote on current questions. Returned for Malton, he produced in 1780 his great plan of economical reform; and in 1782 he became paymaster under Lord Rockingham's government. He again took office in the duke of Portland's coalition ministry, when he made his famous speech on the India bill. In the impeachment of Warren Hastings, Burke played a leading part, his opening speech extending over four days. The outbreak of the French revolution was the occasion of one of his finest efforts of oratory. Burke's attitude in this matter severed his friendship with Fox, and he seceded from the whig party. In 1794 he retired from parliamentary life, though he continued to produce pamphlets on political affairs. His other chief works are A Vindication of Natural Society; Thoughts on the Causes of Present Discontents; Reflections on the Revolution in France; and some Letters. Died at Beaconsfield, England, 1797.

Burlingame, Anson, American diplomatist; born in Chenango county, N. Y., 1820. He was elected member of congress by the republicans of the fifth district of Massachusetts, in 1854–56–58. In 1861 he was sent as minister to China, and in 1867 appointed special Chinese envoy to the United States and to the great powers of Europe. In 1868 he visited this country at the head of a Chinese embassy, and concluded a liberal treaty between the United States and China, which was promptly ratified by the Chinese government. The embassy afterward visited London, Paris, Berlin, and lastly St. Petersburg, where Burlingame suddenly died, 1870.

Burne-Jones, Sir Edward, English painter, was born of Welsh ancestry at Birmingham, England, 1833. He was educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where William Morris, the poet, was his friend. He left without taking a degree, having relinquished orders for art; and about 1857, submitting some pen-drawings to Rossetti, whose work had powerfully influenced him, he received from him encouragement and guidance in his attempts as a painter. From the first he was a fascinating colorist. About 1870 he began to be known as an oil-painter, and his works henceforth are inspired by the earlier art of the Italian renaissance, and show more of grace and less of emphasis than his former paintings. Among his pictures are "The Days of Creation," "The Beguiling of Merlin," "The Mirror of Venus," "Laus Veneris," "Le Chant d'Amour," "Pan and Psyche," "The Golden Stair," "The Wheel of Fortune," "King Cophetua," "The Brazen Tower," and "Briar Rose." He furnished striking designs for stained glass, e. g. at Christ Church, Oxford. He became D. C. L. of Oxford 1881, A. R. A. 1885 (resigned 1893), and a baronet 1894. He died, 1898.

Burns, Robert, Scottish poet, was born at Alloway, near Ayr, Scotland, 1759; died at Dumfries, 1796. He was the son of a small farmer, and was brought up amidst indigence and adversity. He received, however, the advantages of a common school education, though his chief advances in general knowledge he owed to the books he read, among which were The Spectator, the works of Pope, and the poems of Allan Ramsay; while among the unprinted books which enthralled him were the songs and ballads, mostly of unknown authorship, which then circulated in that part of Scotland. When sixteen years of age he fell in love, and his feelings, as he tells us, at once burst into song. His first volume of poetry was issued in 1786, from the provincial press of Kilmarnock, and it at once became popular. The success of this volume, which was speedily republished in Edinburgh, induced him to take the farm of Ellisland, near Dumfries, where he married his "bonny Jean." This speculation of farming proving a failure, he removed to Dumfries in 1791 and, having been appointed to a position as exciseman, which had been obtained for him by a friend and an admirer of his genius, he subsisted entirely upon his income from that office, which yielded only about £70 a year. In 1792 he wrote about a hundred songs, as accompaniments to the melodies of Scotland; and for these, which are now among the world's priceless possessions, he received the sum of £5. Disappointment now embittered him; in his office, a dangerous one to men of his tendencies, intemperance gradually gained upon him, while want threatened him; and, in his thirty-eighth year, he sank into an untimely grave.

Burnside, Ambrose Everett, American general, born at Liberty, Indiana, 1824; served an apprenticeship to a tailor, but graduated at West Point in 1847. He left the army as first-lieutenant in 1852, but returned as colonel of volunteers in 1861, commanded a brigade at Bull Run, and in February, 1862, captured Roanoke island. Having rendered important services at South mountain and Antietam, he in November reluctantly superseded McClellan. In December, 1862, he crossed the Rappahannock, and attacked Lee near Fredericksburg, but was repulsed with a loss of over 10,000 men. In 1863 he successfully held Knoxville, and in 1864 led a corps under Grant through the battles of the Wilderness and Cold Harbor. Resigning in April, 1865, he was elected governor of Rhode Island (1866–68), and United States senator in 1875 and 1881. He died at Bristol, R. I., 1881.

Burr, Aaron, American statesman, was born 1756, died 1836; he was a lieutenant-colonel in the revolutionary war; attorney-general of New York 1789; United States senator 1791–97; mortally wounded Alexander Hamilton in a duel 1804; vice-president of United States 1801–05; tried on a charge of treason, 1807, but acquitted. He was a man of great ability, but grossly immoral both in his political and private life.

Bushnell, Horace, theologian, was born at New Preston, Conn., 1802; graduated, Yale, 1827, and was for some time literary editor New York Journal of Commerce; ordained to the Congregational ministry 1833; preached at Hartford, 1833–59. His works include God in Christ, Christ in Theology, Vicarious Sacrifice, etc. Died at Hartford, 1876.

Butler, Benjamin Franklin, American politician and general, was born in New Hampshire, 1818, studied law and settled in Massachusetts, where he became recognized as the leading democrat of New England. A delegate to the Charleston and Baltimore nominating conventions, he took a leading part in the movement which nominated Breckenridge and divided the party. He promptly entered the service at the outbreak of the civil war, and had command of the departments of the gulf and of the south Atlantic, acquiring no military fame but great notoriety for his arbitrary civil regulations. Elected to congress by the Massachusetts republicans in 1866 and 1868, but, defeated in 1874, he deserted that party, and in 1882 was elected governor by the democrats; renominated in 1883, he was defeated. Died, 1893.

Butler, Joseph, eminent English divine, was born 1692 at Wantage, in Berkshire; died 1752. At the age of twenty-two he gave proof of high metaphysical ability in a letter to Dr. Samuel Clarke, usually appended to that celebrated writer's works. In 1718 he was appointed preacher at the Rolls chapel, where he preached those remarkable sermons which he published in 1726. In 1725 he was presented to the rich benefice of Stanhope, in the county of Durham, to which he removed in the following year. His great work, the Analogy, the germs of which were contained in his three sermons, and which has entitled him, in the eyes of his eloquent disciple, Chalmers, to be called "the Bacon of theology," was published in 1736.

Butler, Nicholas Murray, educator; born, Elizabeth, N. J., 1862; graduated, Columbia, 1882, A. M. 1883, Ph. D. 1884; student at Berlin and Paris, 1884-85; LL. D. from many institutions; Litt. D., university of Oxford, 1905; officier de legion d'honneur, 1906; assistant in philosophy at Columbia university, 1885-86, tutor, 1886–89, adjunct professor, 1889-90, dean faculty of philosophy, 1890, professor philosophy and education, and president since 1902; also president Barnard college, teachers college, and college of pharmacy. Selected in 1912 by republican national committee as candidate for vice-president in place of James S. Sherman, deceased. Editor of the Educational Review; the Great Educators Series; the Teachers' Professional Library; the Columbia University Contributions to Philosophy and Education; co-editor Internationale Pedagogische Bibliothek. Author: The Meaning of Education; Philosophy, etc.

Butler, Samuel, English satirist, was born at Strensham, England, 1612; in his seventeenth year became attached to the household of the earl of Kent, when he frequently attended meetings at the house of a Sir Samuel Luke, a strict Puritan and parliamentarian. The experiences of this time furnished him with the material for his famous work, Hudibras, the first part of which appeared in 1663, and achieved the widest popularity. Two other parts of the work appeared at intervals, but of Butler's life during that time little is known. Died, 1680.

Byron, Lord, George Gordon, English poet, was born in London, 1788. In his eleventh year he succeeded his grand-uncle, William, Lord Byron, and took possession of Newstead abbey, the ancient seat of the family, situated a few miles distant from Nottingham. Byron was placed in a private school at Dulwich, and afterward sent to Harrow. In 1805 he removed to Trinity college, Cambridge, and two years thereafter his first volume of verse, entitled Hours of Idleness, was printed at Newark. The volume was fiercely assailed by Lord Brougham in the Edinburgh Review, and his sarcasms stung Byron into writing English Bards and Scotch Reviewers. In the babble of praise that immediately arose Byron withdrew from England, visited the shores of the Mediterranean, and sojourned in Turkey and Greece. On his return in 1812 he published the first two cantos of Childe Harold, with immense success, and was at once enrolled among the great poets of his country. Six months' stay at Geneva produced the third canto of Childe Harold and The Prisoner of Chillon. Manfred and The Lament of Tasso were written in 1817. The next year he was at Venice, and finished Childe Harold there; and in the gay and witty Beppo made an experiment in the new field which he was afterward to work so successfully. During the next three years he produced the first five cantos of Don Juan, and a number of dramas of various merit, Cain and Werner being opposite poles. In 1822 he removed to Pisa, and worked there at Don Juan, which poem, with the exception of The Vision of Judgment, occupied his pen almost up to the close of his life. Morally his Italian life was unsatisfactory, and his genius was tainted by his indulgences. In the summer of 1823 he sailed for Greece, to aid the struggle for independence with his influence and money. He arrived at Missolonghi on the 4th of January, 1824. There he found nothing but confusion and contending chiefs; but in three months he succeeded in evoking some kind of order from the turbulent patriotic chaos. His health, however, began to fail. On the 9th of April he was overtaken by a shower while on horseback, and fever and rheumatism followed. Medical aid was procured, and copious bleeding recommended; but this Byron, with characteristic willfulness, opposed. Before death he sank into a state of lethargy, and those who were near heard him murmuring about his wife, his sister, and his child. After twenty-four hours' insensibility, he expired on the evening of the 19th of April, 1824. His body was conveyed to England; and, denied a resting-place in Westminster abbey, was interred in Hucknall-Torkard churchyard near Nottingham.

Byström (bŏŏ'-strĕm), Johan Niklas, a Swedish sculptor, born at Filipstad, in the province of Wermland, 1783, worked three years under Sergell of Stockholm, applying himself chiefly to the study of the antique, and gained the academy's prize in 1809. He proceeded to Rome the following year, whence he soon sent home his "Drunken and Reposing Bacchante." He returned to Stockholm in 1815, and exhibited his colossal statue of the prince-royal, which pleased so well that he was commissioned to execute statues of Charles X., XI., and XII. on the same scale. These were followed later by colossal statues of Charles XIII., Gustavus Adolphus, and Charles XIV. He died at Rome, 13th March, 1848. Among his other works are his "Cupid depriving Bacchus of his Attributes," "Nymph going into the Bath," "Hercules at the Breast," "Apollo at the Lyre," "Pandora combing her Hair with a Book in her Hand," a statue of "Linnæus," etc. The works of Byström are all natural and animated.

Cabanis (kä'-bä'-nēs'), Pierre Jean Georges, physician and philosophical writer, born at Cosnac, France, 1757; attached himself to the popular side in the revolution. He furnished Mirabeau with material for his speeches on public education; and Mirabeau died in his arms. During the terror he lived in retirement, and was afterward a teacher in the medical school at Paris, a member of the council of five hundred, then of the senate. He died near Meulan, 1808. His chief work is his once-famous Rapports du Physique et du Moral de l'Homme.

Cabet (kä'-bā'), Étienne, French communist, was born at Dijon, 1788, and died at St. Louis, Mo., 1856, having gone out to Texas in 1848 to found an "Icarian community," so named after his Voyage en Icarie, a "philosophical and social romance," describing a communistic Utopia.

Cable, George Washington, author, was born in New Orleans, 1844; educated in public schools; M.A., Yale, Litt. D., Yale, Bowdoin; served fourth Mississippi cavalry, Confederate States army, 1863–65; clerk in cotton factor's office; for a time reporter on New Orleans Picayune, 1865–79; wrote stories for Scribner's Monthly; since 1879 devoted to literature. Author: Old Creole Days; The Grandissimes; Madame Delphine; The Creoles of Louisiana; Dr. Sevier; The Silent South; Bonaventure; The Negro Question; Strange True Stories of Louisiana; John March, Southerner; Strong Hearts; The Cavalier; Bylow Hill. Founded, 1887, the home-culture clubs — a system of small clubs designed to promote more cordial relations between divergent ranks of society.

Cabot (kăb'-ŭt), George, American shipmaster, afterward merchant, was born 1751, died 1823. He was a member of the Massachusetts state constitutional convention, and of that which ratified the federal constitution; U. S. senator 1791–96; a federalist and friend of Washington and Hamilton. He was a member of the Massachusetts council 1808, and president of the Hartford convention, 1814.

Cabot, John, born 1450(?); Cabot, Sebastian, born 1474, two Venetians, father and son, were both celebrated navigators and discoverers. John, the father, whose business compelled him to reside much in Bristol, England, was appointed by Henry VII., 1496, to the command of a squadron of five vessels on a voyage of discovery in the Atlantic ocean. In this expedition he was accompanied by his sons Ludovico, Sebastian, and Sanzio. In June, 1497, the coast of Labrador was sighted. The merit of this discovery has been generally ascribed to the navigator's second son, Sebastian, the most scientific of the family; but an extract from a chart preserved by Hakluyt mentions the father before the son. John probably died 1498; Sebastian died 1557.

Caedmon (kăd'-mŭn), the father of English song, was the first Anglo-Saxon who composed in his own language of whom there are any remains. The date of his birth is unknown, but his death occurred about 680 A. D. He was originally a cow-herd, attached to the monastery of Whitby, and according to a legend was commanded in a dream to sing "the beginning of created things." He accordingly produced metrical paraphrases of Genesis and other parts of the Bible.

Cæsalpinus (sĕs'-ăl-pī'-nŭs), Andreas, Italian physiologist; born at Arezzo 1519; was professor of medicine and botany at Pisa, physician to Pope Clement VIII., and published several medical works. His most important service to science was his great work On Plants. He developed several new ideas on the circulation of the blood which are now well recognized. Died, 1603.

Cæsar, Caius Julius. See page 425.

Cagliari (kăl'-yä-rē), Paolo Veronese, an Italian painter of great eminence, was born at Verona in 1528. He had for contemporaries both Titian and Tintoretto, and was held in equal admiration with these famous painters. The church of San Sebastiano, in Venice, contains many of his productions, which are reckoned the most important of his earlier period — i. e., the period before he visited Rome, when he first became acquainted with the masterpieces of Raphael and Michaelangelo. The influence of the Roman school on his style was so happy that on his return he received the honor of knighthood from the doge. He died in 1588. The most celebrated of his productions are the "Marriage Feast at Cana of Galilee," "The Calling of St. Andrew to the Apostleship," "The Feast of Simon," and the "Presentation of the Family of Darius to Alexander."

Caine, Thomas Henry Hall, British novelist and dramatist; born in 1853, of Manx and Cumberland parentage; was educated at schools in Isle of Man and Liverpool; brought up as an architect, never practiced, but wrote for Builder, The Building News, etc.; became a journalist, and was for six years an editorial writer on Liverpool Mercury. Went to London at invitation of D. G. Rossetti; lived with poet-painter until his death; wrote for Athenæum, Academy, etc.; published Sonnets of Three Centuries, Recollections of Rossetti; Life of Coleridge; Cobwebs of Criticism. His first novel was the Shadow of a Crime, which he followed with Son of Hagar; his success came with The Deemster; afterward published The Bondman; The Scapegoat; The Manxman; The Christian; The Eternal City; The Prodigal Son, and The White Christ. The Deemster was dramatized in 1889, The Manxman in 1895, The Christian in 1898; The Eternal City was produced simultaneously in the United States and at His Majesty's theater, London, in 1902; The Prodigal Son at Drury Lane, 1905, and The Bondman at same theatre, 1906; a new version of The Christian at the Lyceum in 1907, and Pete (with Louis N. Parker) at the Lyceum in 1908. Published in 1908 My Story, an autobiographical narrative of the earlier years of his literary life. He is justice of the peace in the Isle of Man, where, in 1901, he was returned by a large majority to the house of Keys for Ramsey; edited for her majesty, Queen's Christmas Carol, on behalf of Queen's fund.

Caird (kård), Edward, Scottish philosopher, was born at Greenock, Scotland, 1835; educated at Glasgow university; Balliol college, Oxford; LL. D., St. Andrews, 1883; Glasgow, 1894; D. C. L., Oxford, 1891; D. Lit., Cambridge, 1898; D. Died, 1908.

Caird, John, Scottish preacher, born at Greenock, in 1820; studied at Glasgow, and became minister at Newton-upon-Ayr (1845), Edinburgh (1847), Errol in Perthshire (1849), and Glasgow (1857). His Religion in Common Life, preached before the queen at Crathie in 1855, quickly carried his fame throughout the Protestant world; Dean Stanley said it was the greatest single sermon of the century. He received the degree of D. D. in 1860, was appointed professor of divinity in 1862, and was principal of Glasgow university, 1873–98. He died, 1898. He published a volume of Sermons; An Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion, which revealed a strong neo-Hegelian learning; Spinoza; etc.

Cairnes (kårnz), John Elliot, British economist, was born at Castle Bellingham, Ireland, 1823; studied at Trinity college, Dublin, where he graduated B. A. in 1848. In 1856 he was appointed professor of political economy at Dublin, in 1859 at Queen's college, Galway, and in 1866 at University college, London. An accident in the hunting-field in 1860 led to a breakdown in health; and, having resigned his chair in 1872, he died at Blackheath, 1875. His ten works include Character and Logical Method of Political Economy, The Slave Power, Essays on Political Economy and Some Leading Principles of Political Economy. Cairnes may be regarded as a disciple of Mill, though differing from him on many points; he is second only to him among recent English economists.

Caius Gracchus (kā'-yŭs grăk'-ŭs). See Gracchus.

Cajetan (kăj'-ē-tăn), Cardinal, properly Jacopo Thomas de Vio, born at Gaeta, Italy, 1469; in 1508 became general of the Dominicans, in 1517 cardinal, in 1519 bishop of Gaeta, and in 1523 legate to Hungary. In 1518 he sought to induce Luther to recant at Augsburg. He died at Rome, 1534.

Calderón (kŏl'-dĕr-ŏn) de la Barca, Pedro, Spanish dramatist, and one of the greatest of all time, was born at Madrid in 1600, and was educated at the university of Salamanca. At fourteen he wrote his first drama. He entered the army and served several campaigns in Italy and in Flanders, gaining a knowledge of men and things which he afterward made use of in his plays. He became a priest and royal chaplain, and died in 1681, still working at his literary labors. He wrote about 500 dramas. Among his greatest works are: The Constant Prince, Love is No Joke, Life is a Dream, and The Physician of His Own Honor. In later life he wrote many religious plays. His imagination was brilliant and his writings abound in beautiful passages.

Calderon, Ignacio, diplomat; was born at La Paz, Bolivia, 1848; graduate university of La Paz, in which, at nineteen, he became teacher of history for one year; secretary of Bolivian legation at Rome, 1868–70; then became supervisor of public instruction in Bolivia, and afterward first secretary of Bolivian legation at Lima, Peru; resigned to come to United States, 1876. Traveled through United States, and for a time acted as consul-general of Bolivia at New York; returned to Bolivia, 1886, to manage affairs of large importing and exporting company; selected, 1889, as president Banco Hipotecario, a large financial institution of La Paz; secretary of the treasury of Bolivia, 1900, by appointment of President Pando; minister from Bolivia to United States since March, 1904.

Calderwood (kŏl'-dĕr-wŏŏd), Henry, British philosopher and educator, was born at Peebles in 1830; from 1856 to 1868 was minister of Greyfriars, Glasgow, and then became professor of moral philosophy at Edinburgh. He was the author of The Philosophy of the Infinite; Moral Philosophy; Mind and Brain; Evolution and Man; Vocabulary of Philosophy; David Hume; etc. He died in Edinburgh, 1897.

Calhoun (kăl-hōōn'), John Caldwell, American statesman of Irish Presbyterian descent, was born in Abbeville county, South Carolina, 1782; graduated at Yale, 1804, and became a successful lawyer. He was elected to congress, 1811; in congress he supported the measures which led to the war of 1812–15 with Great Britain, and promoted the protective tariff. In 1817 he entered Monroe's cabinet as secretary of w and did good work in reorganizing the war department. He was vice-president under John Q. Adams (1825–29), and then under Jackson. In 1829 he declared that a state can nullify unconstitutional laws; and his Address to the People of South Carolina in 1831 set forth his theory of state rights. On the passing by South Carolina in 1832 of the nullification ordinance he resigned the vice-presidency, and entered the United States senate, becoming a leader of the states-rights movement, and a champion of the interests of the slave-holding states. In 1844, as secretary of state, he signed a treaty annexing Texas; but once more in the senate, he strenuously opposed the war of 1846–47 with Mexico. He died at Washington, 1850. Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, and Calhoun were "the great triumvirate" of American political orators.

Calhoun, Patrick, lawyer, traction magnate; was born at Fort Hill, S. C., 1856; educated in private schools; admitted to Georgia bar, 1875, Missouri bar, 1876; practiced at Atlanta, Ga., 1878–94; prominent in consolidation of railway and traction interests, notably the Central railroad of Georgia, Richmond & Danville, and Richmond & West Point terminal railway and Warehouse company, for all of which was counsel, 1889–92; has since devoted attention chiefly to consolidation and development of street railways, taking active part in the consolidation of street railway systems in Pittsburgh, St. Louis, Baltimore, and San Francisco. Director Philadelphia company, United railways of Pittsburgh, president United railroads of San Francisco, United Railways investment company of San Francisco, Houston oil company of Texas, Calhoun Falls investment company, and Calhoun mills; owner of Euclid Heights, Cleveland, Ohio, and largely interested in real estate in South Carolina, Georgia, and Texas.

Caligula (kȧ-lĭg'-ū-lȧ), Caius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus, Roman emperor, 37–41 A. D., the youngest son of Germanicus (nephew of Tiberius) by Agrippina, was born 12 A. D., at Antium, and was educated in the camp, where the soldiers gave him the by-name Caligula, from the half boots (caligæ) which he wore. On the death of his brother Drusus, he was made augur in his stead; and on the death of Tiberius, 37 A. D., who, it was suspected, had received foul play at his hands, it was found that he had been appointed co-heir along with the grandson of Tiberius, but the senate and the people allowed Caligula supreme and sole authority. He was, to appearance, lavishly generous and merciful, pardoning even those who had been the instruments of cruelty against his own family, but in reality he was a spendthrift and barbarously cruel. Died, 41 A. D.

Callicrates, a Greek architect, who lived at Athens in the eighty-fourth Olympiad, was, in conjunction with Ictinus, the artist who constructed the famous Parthenon, the sculptures and decorations of which were the work of Phidias.

Callimachus (kă-lĭm'-ȧ-kŭs), a native of Corinth, flourished about the year B. C. 540, and was celebrated as an architect, sculptor, and painter. To him is ascribed the invention of the Corinthian order, the idea of which is said to have been suggested to him by seeing the foliage of an acanthus encircling a basket, on the top of which was a tile.

Calvé (kȧl'-vā'), Emma de Roquer, soprano opera-singer, of Franco-Spanish origin, was born in France in 1866. In 1882 she made her début at Brussels in Gounod's Faust, and since then her career has been one long triumph. Her chief successes have been rôles in Cavalleria Rusticana, in L'Amico Fritz, and in Carmen. She has made successful tours through most of the capitals of Europe, as well as through the chief cities of the United States.

Calvin, John. See page 241.

Cambacérès (känɴ'-bȧ'-sā'-rĕs'), Jean Jacques, duke of Parma, French statesman and jurist, was born in Montpellier in 1753. He was brought up to the legal profession, and became president of the French convention in 1792. He voted for pronouncing Louis XVI. guilty, but denied the right of the convention to proceed to the last extremity, and wished that the unfortunate monarch might be detained in prison, and put to death only in case of invasion. He was afterward president of the committee of public safety, and of the council of five hundred. When Napoleon Bonaparte was named first, Cambacérès was made second consul. During the hundred days after Bonaparte's return, he was president of the chamber of peers. He left France when the Bourbons were a second time restored, but was permitted to return. His Projet de Code Civil formed the basis of the Code Napoleon. Died, 1824.

Cambyses (kăm-bī'-sēz), second king of the Medes and Persians, succeeded his father, Cyrus, in 529 B. C. He put his brother Smerdis to death, and in 527 or 525 invaded and conquered Egypt. He meditated further conquests, but the Tyrian mariners refused to serve against Carthage; an army sent to seize the temple of Ammon perished in the desert; and one which he led in person to Nubia purchased some conquests dearly at the price of myriads of lives. He had given himself up to drunkenness and hideous cruelties, when news came, in 522, that Gaumata, a Magian, had assumed Smerdis's character, and usurped the Persian throne. Cambyses marched against him from Egypt, but died in Syria from an accidental wound.

Cameron (kăm'-ẽr-ŭn), Simon, American politician; born Lancaster county, Pa., 1799; learned printing and became editor of a democratic paper at Harrisburg, Pa.; acquired a large fortune in banking, mining, railroads, etc.; elected United States senator 1845, and again 1856; secretary of war under Lincoln, 1861-62; minister to Russia 1862-63; again United States senator 1866–77 when he resigned, and was succeeded by his son. Died, 1889.

Camillus (kȧ-mĭl'-ŭs), Marcus Furius, a famous patrician of early Rome; took Veii, a rival town, after a ten years' siege; retired into voluntary exile at Ardea on account of the envy of his enemies in Rome; recalled from exile, saved Rome from destruction by the Gauls under Brennus, was five times elected dictator, and gained a succession of victories over rival Italian tribes; died at eighty of the plague, in 365 B. C., lamented by the whole nation, and remembered for generations after as one of the noblest heroic figures in Roman history.

Camoëns (kăm'-ō-ĕns), Luiz de, the epic poet of Portugal, born 1524 at Lisbon, and studied the ancient classics at Coimbra. He sailed for India 1553. Offended by certain abuses of the Portuguese authorities in India, he ventured to expose them in a satire entitled Disparates na India, "Follies in India," in which he treated even the viceroy with ridicule. For this offense he was banished, 1556, to Macao, where he lived several years, and was engaged in writing his principal Os Lusiadas till recalled. He dedicated The Lusiad to the young king, Sebastian, who granted him a small pension (about $20), and permission to remain at the court of Lisbon; died in poverty and obscurity in the hospital at Lisbon, 1580.

Camp, Walter, writer on athletic subjects; born at New Haven, Conn., 1859; graduated at Yale, 1880; has been active in the management of Yale's athletics; member Yale university council; president, treasurer, and general manager of New Haven clock company; treasurer and trustee Hopkins grammar school. Author: Book of College Sports; American Football; Football Facts and Figures; Football; Yale, Her Campus, Class-Room and Athletics; Drives and Puts (with Lillian Brooks). Editor-in-chief Library Young People. Contributor to leading magazines and the "sporting column" in Collier's Weekly.

Campbell, Alexander, American theologian, was born at Shane's castle, Ireland, 1788. Attended Glasgow university; came to the United States, and served as pastor of a Presbyterian church in Washington county, Pa.; later became a Baptist; in 1810 he adopted the Bible as the sole recognized creed of his church, and in 1827 founded the "Disciples of Christ," a sect that grew rapidly, especially in Virginia, Tennessee, and Kentucky, and now numbers over half a million members. His followers are also known as "Christians," "Church of Christ," and "Campbellites." In 1841 Campbell founded and became the first president of Bethany college, West Virginia. He also founded and edited the denominational organ of his church. He died 1866.

Campbell, Archibald. See Argyll.

Campbell, Hon. Archibald, Canadian capitalist, was born at Ridgetown, Ontario, 1846; educated at high school and collegiate institution of the county. Owned large flouring mills at Chatham, Ontario; represented Kent county in the house of commons, 1887–1900; chairman of banking and commerce committee; sold out in Chatham, 1892, and moved to West Toronto where he built the large Queen City flouring mills; elected member of parliament for West York, 1901 and 1907; chairman of the railway and transportation committee; elected to Dominion senate, 1907; president Central railway company of Canada, Campbell milling company of Canada, and Grand and Construction company of Ontario.

Campbell, Sir Colin, Lord Clyde, British general, was born in Glasgow, 1792. His father was a cabinetmaker named John Macliver. In 1808 he entered the army as an ensign, taking, to please an uncle, the name of Campbell. He distinguished himself greatly in the wars in the Peninsula, the United States, China, India, and the Crimean war. He reached the summit of his fame in 1857, when, as commander of the forces in India, he finally crushed the Sepoy mutiny and saved the English empire in India. In 1858 he was created a peer under the title of Baron Clyde, while the East India company granted him an annuity of 2,000 pounds. He returned from India to England in 1860, and died 1863.

Campbell, Mrs. Patrick (Beatrice Stella Tanner), actress; born, Forest House, Kensington Gardens; youngest daughter of John Tanner and Louisa Romanini; married Patrick Campbell (killed in South Africa, 1900), third son of Patrick Campbell, Stranraer, N. B., 1884. Educated at Sussex Gardens, Brighton; Belsize Gardens, Hampstead; one year at Paris, private tuition — language, music. Scholarship, Guildhall school of music. Joined dramatic club, "Anomalies," West Norwood, 1886-87; toured with Green's company, 1888; Bandman Palmer's company, 1889; Ben Greet's company, 1890-91; played engagements at the Adelphi, St. James's, Haymarket, Garrick, Lyceum, and other London theaters.

Campbell, Thomas, a distinguished British poet, born in Glasgow, 1777. He wrote The Pleasures of Hope. The poem was published in 1799, and went through four editions in a twelvemonth. He died at Boulogne in 1844, and was buried in Westminster abbey. Gertrude of Wyoming and the short poem, The Last Man, are well known; but it is for his war lyrics that Campbell will be most remembered, such as Hohenlinden, Ye Mariners of England, and The Battle of the Baltic.

Campbell-Bannerman, Rt. Hon. Sir Henry, former prime minister of Great Britain, was born in 1836. Educated at Glasgow university and Trinity college, Cambridge, B. A., 1858; M. A., 1861; financial secretary in war office, 1871–74 and 1880–82; secretary admiralty, 1882–84; chief secretary of Ireland, 1884-85; secretary for war, 1886 and 1892–95; chosen leader of the liberal opposition in succession to Sir William Harcourt, February, 1899. Notwithstanding the differences between liberal imperialists and other liberals over the Boer war, a unanimous vote of confidence in his leadership was carried at a meeting of the liberal party held at the Reform club, July, 1901. Again received the solid support of the liberal party in the house in 1903, 1904, and 1905. On the resignation of the Balfour administration in December, 1905, he was summoned by the king and formed a liberal cabinet himself becoming first lord of the treasury and prime minister; the general election which followed gave him a tremendous majority. Died in office, 1908.

Canisius (kă-nē′-sē-ŭs), Petrus, Dutch Jesuit missionary and scholar, was born at Nimeguen, Netherlands, 1521. He was the first provincial of the Jesuits in Germany, distinguished himself at the council of Trent, 1545, and was appointed court preacher to Ferdinand I. He wrote Summa Doctrinæ Christianæ. Died, 1597.

Canning, George, British statesman and orator, born in London, 1770. He entered the house of commons for Newport, isle of Wight, in 1793, as the protégé and supporter of the minister, Pitt. In 1796 he was appointed an under-secretary of state. In 1801 Pitt resigned office, and Canning joined the opposition against the Addington ministry. When Pitt again became premier, in 1804, Canning was made treasurer of the navy, an office which he held until Pitt's death, in 1806. When the Portland ministry was formed, in 1807, Canning was appointed minister of foreign affairs. In 1812 his eloquence was enlisted in favor of Catholic emancipation. He arranged the relations of Brazil and Portugal; drew the French cabinet into agreement with the British respecting Spanish-American affairs; was the first to recognize the free states of Spanish America; promoted the treaty combining England, France, and Russia for a settlement of the affairs of Greece, which was signed July 6, 1827; protected Portugal from Spanish invasion; contended earnestly for Catholic emancipation, and prepared the way for the repeal of the corn-laws. Died, 1827.

Cannon, Joseph G., lawyer, former speaker of the United States house of representatives; born in Guilford, N. C., 1836; admitted to Illinois bar; state's attorney, Vermilion county, Ill., 1861–68; member of congress, 1873–91, and again in 1893–1903, 12th Illinois district, and 1903–13, 18th district; chairman of committee on appropriations, 55th, 56th, and 57th congresses; speaker of 58th, 59th, 60th, and 61st congresses.

Canova (kä-nō′-vä), Antonio, Italian sculptor, was born, 1757, at the Venetian village of Possagno, and studied at Venice and Rome. His "Theseus," 1782, was greeted as well worthy to vie with classic art, and he was regarded as the founder of a new school. His "Cupid and Psyche" was produced soon after he had completed in 1787 the monument of Pope Clement XIV. Other works were a "Winged Cupid," "Venus and Adonis," a "Psyche holding a Butterfly," "Penitent Magdalen," and "Perseus with the head of the Medusa," a second famous papal monument, and one at Vienna to an archduchess. In 1802 he was appointed by Pius VII. curator of works of art, and was called to Paris to model a colossal statue of Napoleon. In 1815 the pope sent him again to Paris to recover the works of art taken there, and he visited England. Created marquis of Ischia, he died in Venice, 1822.

Cánovas del Castillo (kä′-nō-väs dĕl käs-tēl′-yō), Antonio, Spanish conservative statesman and historian, born at Malaga, 1828, became a member of the cortes in 1854, and was premier 1875–81, 1884–85, 1890–92, and from 1895 till the 8th of August, 1897, when, at the bath of Santa Agueda, Vittoria, he was shot by an anarchist in the presence of his wife.

Canrobert (käɴ′-rō′-bâr′), François Certain, marshal of France, born 1809. After many years of effective service in the East, in the Crimea, and in Italy, when war was declared by France against Prussia, in 1870, he was one of the generals in command at Wœrth, where the French were defeated. He was shut up in Metz with Bazaine, and was a prisoner in Germany from the capitulation of that fortress to the conclusion of peace; senator 1876. Died, 1895.

Canterbury, Archbishop of. See Davidson, Rev. Randall Thomas.

Cantù (kăn-tōō'), Cesare, modern Italian author, was born, 1805, at Brivio, in northern Italy, and was educated at Sondrio, where he was appointed professor of belles-lettres. Having been imprisoned for the offense of expressing liberal tendencies in an historical work on Lombardy, he spent his leisure hours in describing the sorrows of a prisoner in the form of an historical romance. His great work is the Storia Universale (35 vols., 1837–1842). His History of Italian Literature appeared in 1851; History of the Last Hundred Years, 1852; History of the Italians, 1859; and Milano, Storia del Popolo, 1871. Died, 1895.

Canute (kȧ-nūt'), or Cnut (k'nŏŏt), a king of England who succeeded to the rulership of the Danes in the north of England on the death of his father, Swein or Sweyn, was born 995. On the death of Ethelred he shared the sovereignty with Edmund Ironside, who ruled over the south of England. The sudden decease or assassination of Edmund made Canute sole ruler in 1017, and he continued to reign until his death in 1035. Canute superseded his brother Harold as king of Denmark; and in 1028 extended his dominion over Norway — becoming one of the most powerful princes of Europe.

Capet (kă'-pĕt), Hugh. See Hugh Capet.

Capo D'Istria (kä'-pō dēs'-trē-ä), John, Count of, a Greek, who gained distinction as a diplomat, was born at Corfu in 1776. His father was a physician, and became governor of the seven Ionian islands when they were occupied by Russia. John, who had studied medicine at Venice, entered the service of Russia; and in 1813, in consideration of his meritorious labors, the emperor Alexander made him minister for foreign affairs. In 1827 he was made president of the new Greek government, where he fell by the hand of an assassin in 1831.

Caprivi (kä-prē'-vē), Count Georg Leo von, German general, statesman, and chancellor, was born in 1831, and died in 1899. He entered the army in his 18th year, won rapid promotion, and served with distinction in the campaigns of 1864 and 1866. In 1882 he was given command of the 30th division of the imperial army at Metz; for a time was also at the head of the German admiralty, and reorganized the navy; was subsequently given command of the 10th or Hanoverian army corps, the finest in the German army. In 1890, on the fall of Bismarck, Emperor William made him chancellor and minister for foreign affairs. In 1894, owing to friction with Count Eulenberg over the agrarian malcontents, he resigned office, and retired.

Caracalla (kăr'-ȧ-kăl'-ȧ) (properly Marcus Aurelius Antoninus Bassianus), Roman emperor, the son of the emperor Septimius Severus, born at Lyons, 188 A. D. He was playfully named by his father Caracalla, from his long-hooded tunic. After his father's death, 211 A. D., he ascended the throne as co-regent with his brother, Publius Septimius Antoninus Geta, whom he afterward caused to be murdered. Having bribed the pretorians to make him sole emperor, Caracalla next directed his cruelty against all the friends and adherents of Geta, of whom 20,000 of both sexes — including the great jurist Papinianus — were put to death. In his famous constitution he bestowed Roman citizenship on all his free subjects not citizens — but simply in order to levy a greater amount of taxes on releases and heritages, which were paid only by citizens. He was assassinated, at the instigation of Macrinus, prefect of the pretorians, by one of his veterans named Martialis, 217 A. D.

Caracci (kȧ-rä'-chē), or Carracci, Agostino, Italian painter, was born in Bologna in 1558, became a disciple of his cousin Ludovico, but he was too versatile to devote himself closely to any subject, though his "Communion of St. Jerome," still at Bologna, is an admirable work. He dabbled in poetry and literature, and was a really great engraver on copper. His brother's jealousy is said to have driven him from Rome (where they did the frescoes in the Farnese palace) to Parma, where he died, 1602.

Caracci, Annibale, was born in Bologna in 1560, died, 1609; was bred a tailor, but rapidly became a great painter under his cousin, and soon outstripped both him and his brother. The influence of Correggio and of Raphael largely moulded his style. His fame reached Rome, where he was employed to fresco the Farnese palace. He was buried close to Raphael in the Pantheon. His most celebrated easel-picture is the "Three Maries."

Caracci, Ludovico, Italian painter, the son of a butcher, was born at Bologna in 1555, died, 1619; studied at Venice and Parma, and, with his two cousins, established in Bologna an "eclectic" school of painting. Some of his finest works are preserved at Bologna — among others, the "Madonna and Child Throned," "Madonna and Child Standing," the "Transfiguration," and the "Nativity of St. John the Baptist."

Cardan (kär'-dăn), Jerome, Italian mathematician, naturalist, physician, and philosopher, was born at Pavia, 1501; graduated in medicine at Padua; and was professor of mathematics at Milan. He subsequently practiced medicine and gradually gained a high reputation. In 1559 he became professor of medicine at Pavia, later at Bologna; and there in 1570 we find him in prison for heresy or debt, or both. Having regained his liberty in 1571, he went to Rome, where Gregory XII. pensioned him. He died in Rome, 1576, a few weeks after finishing his candid autobiography, De Propria Vita. He wrote over a hundred treatises on physics, mathematics, astronomy, astrology, rhetoric, history, ethics, dialectics, natural history, music, and medicine.

Cardigan (kär'-dĭ-gan), James Thomas Brudenell, Earl of, was born 1797; died 1868; sat in the house of commons from 1818 to 1837, when he succeeded his father as seventh earl. He entered the army in 1824, and rapidly bought himself into the command of the 15th hussars, which he resigned in 1833, on the acquittal of an officer whom he had illegally put under arrest. From 1836 to 1847 he commanded the 11th hussars, on which he spent 10,000 pounds a year, and which he made the crack regiment in the service. He was unpopular with his officers, and his treatment of them brought about a duel with Captain Harvey Tuckett, for which in 1841 Cardigan was tried before the house of lords, but escaped through a legal quibble. He commanded a cavalry brigade under Lord Lucan in the Crimea, and led the "Six Hundred" at Balaklava. He was inspector-general of cavalry 1855–60.

Carducci (kär-dŏŏt'-chē), Giosuè, Italian poet, was born, a physician's son, at Valdicastello, in the province of Pisa, in 1836, and died in 1907. In 1861 he became professor of Italian literature at Bologna, in 1876 was returned to the Italian parliament as a republican, and in 1890 was nominated a senator. A complete edition of his poems in twenty volumes appeared at Bologna in 1889 et seq. Awarded Nobel prize, 1906.

Castelar became dictator, but, when Alphonso XII. became king, he fled across the frontier. He returned to Spain in 1876, and devoted himself more to literature than to political and social questions. He died in 1899.

Castlereagh (kăs'l-rā', kăs''l-rā), Robert Stewart, Lord, British statesman, eldest son of the marquis of Londonderry; was born in 1769. At an early period he entered into public life, and was appointed keeper of the signet, or privy seal, in Ireland, in 1797; president of the board of control in 1802; and secretary of war in 1805. A difference having arisen between him and his colleague, Canning, a duel was the consequence, and both quitted office. During Lord Liverpool's administration, Lord Castlereagh again became a member of the government as foreign secretary, and concluded the treaty of Paris in 1814. He remained in office the remainder of his life, which was closed by suicide in 1822.

Catharine I., empress of Russia; born about 1685; was the outcast infant of a Livonian peasant-girl, and was brought up in the family of the Protestant minister of Marienburg. In 1701 she married a Swedish dragoon, who soon afterward went with his regiment to Riga, and never returned. After the capture of Marienburg by the Russians, Catharine became the mistress first of General Bauer, with whom she lived at Moscow, secondly of Prince Menschikoff, and, finally, of Peter the Great, who married her privately near Warsaw in 1711, and publicly the next year at St. Petersburg. She then embraced the Greek religion, and took the name of Catharine. On the death of Peter in 1725, she was proclaimed czarina. Her death was the result of intemperance. Died, 1727.

Catharine II., empress of Russia; born in 1729; the princess Sophia Augusta, daughter of the prince of Anhalt-Zerbst, on her marriage in 1745, with Peter, nephew and heir of the empress Elizabeth, assumed the name of Catharine Alexievna. Her refinement and love of study contrasted with her husband's vulgarity and intemperance; neglected by him, she ingratiated herself with some of the nobles; her intrigues were discovered by Peter, and, on ascending the throne in 1762, he threatened to repudiate her, whereupon she imprisoned him and had him strangled. The subsequent murder of Ivan, the next heir, left Catharine in undisputed possession of the throne. As empress she seized the Crimea, and took part in the dismemberment of Poland. She promoted the welfare of Russia by encouraging literature and commerce, but her reign was sullied by disgraceful amours. Died, 1796.

Catharine, Saint, of Siena, is a saint belonging to the fourteenth century, born about 1347. She was said to have been favored with extraordinary revelations, and the wounds of Christ were believed to have been impressed upon her body. She wrote many devotional letters, poems, etc., which are held in high favor by members of the Roman Catholic church. Died, 1380.

Catharine of Aragon, queen of England; born in 1485; daughter of Ferdinand of Aragon and Isabella of Castile; first married Arthur, prince of Wales, and subsequently his brother, afterward Henry VIII. She was beautiful and virtuous, yet the king in 1527 sought a divorce on the ground that the marriage was uncanonical. After much temporizing on the part of the pope, the marriage was in 1533 pronounced invalid by Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, and his sentence was ratified by act of parliament. Catharine spent the final years of her life in Kimbolton castle. Died, 1536.

Catharine de'Medici (dā mā'-dē-chē), born in 1519; great granddaughter of Lorenzo the Magnificent, niece of Pope Clement VII., and queen to Henry II. of France, acted as regent during the minority of her second son, Charles IX.; her policy was to play off the parties of the Guises and the Condés against one another. She instigated the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Died, 1589.

Catharine Parr, born in 1512; daughter of Sir Thomas Parr; was married first to Edward Borough, second to Lord Latimer, and in 1543 became the sixth and last wife of Henry VIII. She was learned in theology and a zealous Protestant, and, according to Foxe, on one occasion only escaped death as a heretic by timely submission to the king. She survived Henry, and in 1547 married Lord Seymour of Sudeley, who was accused of hastening her death (in child-birth), by poisoning. Died, 1548.

Catiline (kăt'-ĭ-līn), Lucius Sergius, Roman politician, born about the year 108 B. C., died 62 B. C. During his youth he attached himself to the party of Sulla. His bodily constitution, which was capable of enduring any amount of labor, fatigue, and hardship, allied to a mind which could stoop to every baseness and feared no crime, fitted him to take the lead in the conspiracy which has made his name infamous to all ages. In the year 68 B. C. he was elected pretor; in 67 B. C. governor of Africa; and in 66 B. C. he desired to stand for the consulship, but was disqualified on account of the accusations brought against him of maladministration in his province. His political conspiracies were frustrated by Cicero, and he fled from Rome and took refuge with Manlius, who was in command of the army in Etruria. In 62 B. C. the army of the senate encountered that of Catiline near Pistoia, and after a desperate battle, in which Catiline displayed almost superhuman courage, he was defeated and slain.

Catlin, George, ethnologist, was born at Wilkesbarre, Pa., 1796; studied law, but soon turned to drawing and painting. During 1832–40 he was studying the Indians of the far West, everywhere painting portraits and pictures illustrative of life and manners, now in the national museum at Washington. He spent eight years in Europe with a far west show; traveled, 1852–57, in South and Central America; and again lived in Europe until 1871. He died in 1872. His works include Manners, Customs, and Condition of the North American Indians, The North American Portfolio, and Last Rambles in the Rocky Mountains.

Cato, Marcus Porcius, surnamed Censorius and Sapiens, afterward known as Cato Priscus, or Cato Major — to distinguish him from Cato of Utica — born at Tusculum in 234 B. C. Induced by Lucius Valerius Flaccus to remove to Rome when that city was in a transition epoch from severe frugality to the luxury and licentiousness of Grecian manners, Cato severely denounced the degeneracy of the Philohellenic party, and set for Rome a pattern of sterner and purer character. In 184 B. C. he was elected censor, and discharged so rigorously the duties of his office that the epithet Censorius, formerly applied to all persons in the same station, was made his permanent surname. Many of his acts were highly commendable. He repaired the water-courses, paved the reservoirs, cleansed the drains, raised the rents paid by the publicans for the farming of the taxes, and diminished the contract prices paid by the state to the undertakers of public works. In the year 175 B. C. he was sent to Carthage to negotiate on the differences between the Carthaginians and the Numidian king, Masinissa; but having been offended by the Carthaginians he returned to Rome, where, ever afterward, he described Carthage as the most formidable rival of the empire, and concluded all his addresses in the senate-house — whatever the immediate subject might be — with the well-known words: "Ceterum censeo, Carthaginem esse delendam." ("For the rest, I vote that Carthage must be destroyed.") Cato died 149 B.C.

Cato, Marcus Porcius, named Cato the "younger," or Cato Uticensis, born 95 B.C. From Macedonia, where he was military tribune in 67 B. C., he went to Pergamus in search of the stoic philosopher, Athenodorus, whom he brought back to his camp, and whom he induced to proceed with him to Rome. He quitted the questorship at the appointed time amid general applause. In 63 B. C. he was elected tribune, and also delivered his famous speech on the Catiline conspiracy, in which he denounced Cæsar as an accomplice of that political desperado, and determined the sentence of the senate. Died 46 B. C.

Catt, Carrie Chapman, suffragist, president international woman suffrage alliance; born Ripon, Wis.; daughter of Lucius and Maria (Clinton) Lane; educated at state industrial college of Iowa; took special course in law; was principal of high school and general superintendent of schools, Mason City, Ia.; married first, 1884, Leo Chapman, who died 1886; second, 1890, George W. Catt, who died 1905. State lecturer and organizer, Iowa woman suffrage association, 1890–92; since then in service of national American woman suffrage association and international alliance. Has lectured in nearly every state; worked for suffrage in successful campaigns in Colorado and Idaho; aided in movement which secured clause in Louisiana constitution giving tax-paying women right to vote on all questions submitted to the taxpayers.

Cattell (kă-tĕl'), James McKeen, educator, psychologist, professor of psychology, Columbia, since 1891; born Easton, Pa., 1860; graduate of Lafayette college, 1880, A. M., 1883; Ph. D., Leipzig, 1886; student Göttingen, Leipzig, Paris, Geneva, 1880–82; fellow Johns Hopkins, 1882-83; student and assistant university of Leipzig, 1883–86; lecturer university of Cambridge, 1888; professor psychology, university of Pennsylvania, 1888–91. Member of many scientific societies. Editor of Science, The Popular Science Monthly, The American Naturalist, and American Men of Science.

Catullus (kȧ-tŭl'-ŭs), Caius Valerius, celebrated Roman lyric and elegiac poet, is supposed to have been born at Verona, Italy, B. C. 87, and to have died about B. C. 54; associated with the best wits in Rome; fell in love with Clodia, a patrician lady, who was the inspiration, both in peace and war, of many of his effusions, and whom he addresses as Lesbia. The death of a brother affected him deeply, and was the occasion of the production of one of the most pathetic elegies ever penned; in the civic strife of the time he sided with the senate, and opposed Cæsar to the length of directing against him a coarse lampoon.

Cauchy (kō'-shē'), Augustin Louis, French mathematician, the founder with Bolzano of the theory of functions, was born in Paris, 1789. His Mémoire sur la Théorie des Ondes helped to establish the undulatory theory of light; at Prague, where he resided as tutor to the Comte de Chambord, he published his Mémoire sur la Dispersion de la Lumière. He was professor of astronomy at Paris, 1848–52, but refused the oath of allegiance to Napoleon III. A reissue of his works, in twenty-six volumes, was commenced by the French academy in 1882. Died, 1857.

Caulaincourt (kō'-lăɴ'-ko͞or'). Armand Augustin Louis de, duke of Vicenza, French statesman, was born 1772; was made a general of division in 1805, and shortly after created duke of Vicenza. Faithful to the last to Napoleon, he was minister for foreign affairs in 1813, and during the hundred days resumed the office, receiving a peerage of France, of which he was deprived after the restoration. When Napoleon abdicated, Caulaincourt used his influence with Alexander to obtain the most favorable conditions for the fallen emperor, and, chiefly through his intervention, the island of Elba was ceded to Napoleon. On the second restoration he retired into private life. Died in Paris, 1827.

Cavaignac (kȧ'-vĕn'-yȧk'), Louis Eugène, French general, born in Paris, 1802. Bred a soldier, he served in the Morea, and afterward in Algeria, whither he was sent in 1832, into honorable exile for free speech in favor of republican institutions. Here he won great distinction by his energy and intrepidity, and was made governor-general in 1848, when in view of revolutionary dangers he was called to Paris, and became minister of war. As military dictator he quelled the formidable insurrection of June, after a most obstinate three days' contest. He was the candidate for the presidency of the republic against Louis Napoleon. On the coup d'état of December, 1851, he was arrested but soon released; and, though he refused to give his adhesion to the empire, he was permitted to reside in France. He died 1857.

Cavendish (kăv'-en-dĭsh), Henry, English chemist and physicist, was born at Nice, France, 1731, died 1810. His most important work included the discovery of the composition of water, the composition of nitric acid, and the determination of the mean density of the earth. Since the discovery of argon by Rayleigh and Ramsay, it has become evident that Cavendish in his studies on the composition of air, had, at that early date, isolated argon, without knowing it. He was a man of large wealth.

Cavour (kȧ'-vo͞or'), Count Camillo Benso di, distinguished Italian statesman of the nineteenth century, the descendant of a noble and wealthy family of Piedmont, was born at Turin, 1810. He was educated for a military career, but his liberal tendencies being likely to prove an insuperable barrier to his promotion, he retired during the stirring events of 1830-31, and devoted himself to agriculture, in which he introduced great improvements. He was the first to use guano in Piedmont; and, at his instigation, a national agricultural society was formed. During a residence in England he made himself intimately acquainted with the political organization of the country, and also with its industrial institutions; knowledge of which he made good use on his return to his country in 1842. In conjunction with Count Cesare Balbo, he in 1847 established a political daily journal, in which he advocated the interests of the middle classes, a representative system somewhat after the pattern of the English constitution, as opposed alike to absolutism on the one hand, and mob rule on the other. On his suggestion the king was petitioned for a constitution, which was granted in February, 1848. As a member of the chamber of deputies, during the stormy period which succeeded Charles Albert's declaration of war against Austria, Cavour strenuously opposed the ultra-democrats, and counselled an alliance with England as the surest guarantee for the success of the Italian arms. In the Marquis d'Azeglio's ministry, formed soon after the fatal battle of Novara, Cavour was successively minister of agriculture and commerce, minister of marine, and minister of finance; and in 1852 he was appointed to succeed D'Azeglio as premier. From this time until his resignation in 1859, in consequence of the conclusion of the peace of Villafranca, Cavour was the originator as well as the director of the Sardinian policy. Taking upon himself at different times, in addition to the premiership, the duties of the ministers of finance, commerce, and agriculture, and latterly of home and foreign affairs, he greatly improved the financial condition of the country, introduced free trade, consolidated constitutionalism, weakened clerical influence, and made Sardinia a power of some account in Europe, by bringing it into alliance with England and France against Russia. The dispatches, which Cavour penned in reply to those of Austria prior to the outbreak of the Italian war, are universally acknowledged as masterpieces of astute diplomacy. In 1860 he was again called upon to preside over the Sardinian government, the duties of foreign minister likewise devolving upon him, and temporarily those of the minister of the interior also. He continued to direct the Sardinian policy until his death, 1861. His last words were, "Brothers brothers, the free church in the free state."

Caxton, William, the founder of English printing, was born in 1422. During a residence in Flanders he acquired the new typographic art, and on his return set up a press in the almonry, Westminster, where he brought out the first printed book seen in England, the History of Troy. Died, 1491.

Cayley (kā'-lĭ), Arthur, English mathematician, was born at Richmond, Surrey, 1821. He was educated at King's college, London, and Trinity college, Cambridge. He was admitted to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1849, and established a practice as a conveyancer. In 1863 he was elected first Sadlerian professor of pure mathematics at Cambridge, and in 1875 a fellow of Trinity. He was president of the royal astronomical society, 1872-73, and of the British association in 1883, where his address on the ultimate possibilities of mathematics attracted much attention. His chief book is an Elementary Treatise on Elliptic Functions; a ten volume edition of his Mathematical Papers was begun in 1889. He died at Cambridge, 1895.

Cecil (sĕs'-ĭl or sĭs'-ĭl), William, Lord Burleigh, English statesman, was born at Bourne, Lincolnshire, 1520. Entering Gray's Inn at the age of twenty-one he devoted himself assiduously to the study of law. History, genealogy, and theology also formed part of his studies, and his knowledge of the last recommended him to the notice of Henry VIII., who presented him with an office in the common pleas; in 1547 appointed him master of requests, and in the following year his talents procured for him the office of secretary of state. When Queen Mary ascended the throne, Cecil, being a Protestant, resigned his official employment, but as a private gentleman he maintained good relations with the Roman Catholic party, and was one of the few eminent Protestants who escaped in purse and person during that reign. Elizabeth created him Baron Burleigh in 1571, and conferred on him the order of the garter, when he was also made lord high treasurer. Died, 1598.

Cecilia (sē-sĭl'-ĭ-ȧ), Saint, a Roman lady of high descent, of the second or third century, who suffered martyrdom for her faith. From her skill in singing she is the chosen patroness of musicians, and especially of sacred music. St. Cecilia's day, November 22d, is annually celebrated in England by a musical festival.

Cellini (chĕl-lē'-nē), Benvenuto, Italian gold-worker, sculptor, founder, and medailleur, was born at Florence in 1500, and first displayed skill as a chaser and gold-worker. At an early period, having been banished from Florence in consequence of a duel, he went to Rome, where he was employed by many distinguished patrons of art, but afterward was allowed to return to Florence. Another affray compelled him to fly to Rome a second time, where he secured the favor of Clement VII. He accompanied Cardinal Ferrara to France, and entered the service of Francis I. He executed several fine works in metal and marble — among them the celebrated bronze group of "Perseus with the Head of Medusa," now in the market-place in Florence. He died in 1571.

Celsius (sĕl'-sĭ-ŭs), Anders, Swedish astronomer, the constructor in 1742 of the centigrade thermometer, was born at Upsala, 1701. He was the grandson of Magnus Celsius, astronomer and decipherer of the Helsing runes, and nephew of Olof Celsius, professor of theology. He became in 1730 professor of astronomy at Upsala, where in 1740 a splendid observatory was erected for him. Died, 1744.

Celsus (sĕl'-sŭs), an Epicurean philosopher, but tinged with Platonism, lived in the second century after Christ, and wrote, after 150 A. D., the Logos Alethes. The book itself has perished, but considerable fragments have been preserved as quotations given by Origen, in his answer, Contra Celsum, in eight books. These are very interesting, as showing the views of a heathen philosopher in regard to Christianity. He reproached Christians with their party divisions and ever-varying opinions, and charged them with having willfully altered their sacred writings.

Cenci (chĕn'-chē), Beatrice, a noble Roman lady, whose tragic fate has served as the theme of one of Shelley's best tragedies, lived in the sixteenth century. She became the victim of her father, Count Francesco Cenci, a notorious libertine. Failing in her appeal for protection from Pope Clement VIII., she, it has been said, conspired with other members of her family to murder the count. When brought to trial on this charge, she asserted her innocence, but was, nevertheless, put to death, along with her relatives, in 1599. The fine portrait of Beatrice, by Guido Reni, in the Barberini gallery, Rome, is well known.

Cervantes (sĕr-văn'-tēz). See page 43.

Cesnola (chās-nō'-lȧ), Count Luigi Palma di, archæologist, was born near Turin, 1832. He served with the Sardinian contingent in the Crimean war, went to New York in 1860, and fought in the civil war. Appointed American consul at Cyprus in 1865, he commenced a series of excavations; his splendid collection of statues, lamps, vases, inscriptions, etc., was purchased by the Metropolitan museum, New York, in 1873, of which he became director in 1879. He wrote Cyprus, its ancient Cities, Tombs, and Temples. Died, 1904.

Chaffee (chăf'-ē), Adna Romanza, American general; born in Orwell, Ohio, 1842; educated in public schools. Entered army, 1861, and served throughout the civil war, and against the Indians in the West at various periods from 1866–90. Appointed brigadier-general, United States volunteers, 1898; commanded brigade, Santiago campaign, 1898; promoted major-general, United States volunteers, 1898; chief of staff division of Cuba, December, 1898, to May, 1900. Honorably discharged as major-general, 1899. Appointed brigadier-general of United States volunteers, 1899. Assigned to the command of United States forces for the relief of United States legation, Peking, 1900; arrived at Peking, China, August 14, 1900; promoted to major-general of United States volunteers, 1900; promoted to major-general of United States army, 1901. Assigned to command division of the Philippines and appointed military governor, 1901; relieved, 1902, and assigned to command department of the East; detailed to general staff corps, 1903, and assigned to duty as assistant to chief of staff, Washington; promoted to lieutenant-general of United States army, 1904, and chief of staff until his retirement in 1906.

Chafin, Eugene W., temperance advocate; born East Troy, Wis., 1852; educated at public schools; graduate of law department of university of Wisconsin. Practiced law, Waukesha, 1876–1900; active as speaker and organizer in temperance and prohibition movements; was superintendent of Washingtonian Home, Chicago, 1901–04; grand chief templar of Wisconsin Good Templars, 1886–90; prohibition candidate for congress, Wisconsin, 1882, Chicago, 1902; for attorney-general, Wisconsin, 1886, 1900; for governor of Wisconsin, 1898, and for attorney-general, Illinois, 1904. Grand chief templar, Illinois Good Templars, 1904–05. Prohibition candidate for president 1908. Author: Voters' Handbook, Lives of the Presidents, Presidential-Cabinet History Cards.

Chalmers (chä'-mĕrz, chô'-mĕrz), Thomas, Scottish divine, was born in Fife, 1780; educated at St. Andrews, and ordained to preach at nineteen; taught mathematics after his ordination. In 1815 he became a minister at Glasgow, and at once attracted attention by his eloquence. He was subsequently professor of moral philosophy at St. Andrews, 1823, and of theology at Edinburgh, 1828. On the disruption of the church of Scotland in 1843, he joined the Free church party, and became moderator of its assembly and principal of its college. His writings embrace a wide range of subjects, including natural science and political economy. Died, 1847.

Chamberlain (chām'-bĕr-lĭn), George Earle, lawyer, United States senator; born near Natchez, Miss., 1854; graduate of Washington and Lee university, B. A., LL. B., 1876. Went to Oregon, 1876; elected to legislature, 1880; district attorney third judicial district, 1884–86; appointed attorney-general, Oregon, 1891; elected to same position, 1892, and served until 1895; elected district attorney, fourth judicial district, 1900, for four year term; elected governor of Oregon for terms, 1903–07, 1907–11; elected United States senator for the term 1909–15.

Chamberlain, Rt. Hon. Joseph, British statesman, was born in London, 1836; educated in private school and University college, London; LL. D., Cambridge, D. C. L., Oxford; joined the firm of Nettlefold, screw makers of Birmingham; was one of the leaders of the defeated unsectarian candidates for the school board of Birmingham in 1870, but in 1873 he was elected chairman, and was also a member of the town council (mayor, 1873). On the death of his father he retired from the firm, in order to devote all his energies to public life. To him was due the transfer of the gas and water works to the borough authorities, and he was the author of the improvement scheme which has entirely transformed the face of central Birmingham. In 1876 he entered parliament and took his seat with the radicals; president of board of trade, with cabinet rank, 1880–85, and passed a patent bill and a bankruptcy bill; president of local government board in 1885, until his divergence of views on the Irish policy of Gladstone caused his resignation, 1886; chief commissioner to the conference at Washington for the settlement of the dispute between the United States and Canada on the fisheries question. Married Miss Endicott, November 15, 1888. In 1895 took office under Lord Salisbury as colonial secretary. The negotiations with the Transvaal, which ended in war, occupied him fully during 1899, and his South African policy was one of the main controversial features of the general election of 1900 and during 1901. He had charge in 1900 of the measure for the constitution of the Australian commonwealth. In 1902 he was presented with an address by the city of London corporation. He presided over the 1902 colonial conference. In 1902 he visited South Africa, and on his return received an address from the lord mayor and corporation of London, 1903. In 1903 he launched, at Birmingham, his scheme for the revision of the fiscal policy of the country and the adoption of a policy of preferential tariffs, and in September, believing that policy to be at that time unacceptable to the majority in the constituencies, he resigned in order to be free to devote himself to explaining and popularizing his proposals. He began his campaign for this purpose at Glasgow in 1903, and the tariff commission was afterward appointed on his initiative. His 70th birthday and completion of thirty years' service as member of parliament for Birmingham were celebrated on July 7, 1906.

Chamberlin, Thomas Chrowder, geologist; born Mattoon, Ill., 1843; graduate of Beloit college, 1866; Ph. D., universities of Michigan and Wisconsin, 1882; LL. D., university of Michigan, Beloit college, and Columbian, 1887, university of Wisconsin, 1904; Sc. D., university of Illinois, 1905. Professor natural science, state normal school, Whitewater, Wis., 1869–73; professor geology, Beloit, 1873–82; president university of Wisconsin, 1887–92; professor and head department of geology and director Walker museum, university of Chicago, since 1892. Assistant state geologist, Wisconsin, 1873–76, chief geologist, Wisconsin, 1876–82; studied glaciers of Switzerland, 1878; United States geologist in charge of glacial division since 1882; geologist Peary relief expedition, 1894; consulting geologist, Wisconsin geological survey. Author: Geology of Wisconsin; General Treatise on Geology (with R. D. Salisbury), etc. Editor of The Journal of Geology.

Chambers, Robert, Scottish publisher, was born in Peebles, 1802, began business as a bookseller in Edinburgh in 1818 and gave his leisure to literary composition. In 1824 he produced the Traditions of Edinburgh; and between 1822 and 1834 he wrote twenty-five volumes. The success of the Journal was materially promoted by his essays and his literary insight. In 1844 he published anonymously the Vestiges of Creation, which prepared the way for Darwin's Origin of Species. He received the degree of LL. D. from St. Andrews in 1863. The labor of preparing the Book of Days broke his health, and he died at St. Andrews, 1871. Other works by Robert are Popular Rhymes of Scotland; a History of the Rebellions in Scotland; Life of James I.; Scottish Ballads and Songs; Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen; Ancient Sea Margins; The Life and Works of Robert Burns (4 vols.); Domestic Annals of Scotland and Songs of Scotland prior to Burns.

Chambers, Robert William, author, artist; born in Brooklyn, 1865; educated at Julien's academy, Paris, 1886–93. First exhibited in salon, 1889; illustrator for Life, Truth, Vogue, etc. Author: In the Quarter; The King in Yellow; The Red Republic; A King and a Few Dukes; The Maker of Moons; With the Band; The Mystery of Choice; Lorraine; Ashes of Empire; The Haunts of Men; The Cambric Mask; Outsiders; The Conspirators; Cardigan; The Maid-at-Arms; Outdoor Land; The Maids of Paradise; Orchard-Land; Forest-Land; Iole; The Fighting Chance; The Firing Line; The Tree of Heaven; The Smart Set, etc.; also The Witch of Ellangowan, a drama played at Daly's theater and written for Miss Ada Rehan; and many magazine stories.

Chambers, William, Scottish publisher, was born at Peebles in 1800. In 1814 he was apprenticed to a bookseller in Edinburgh, and in 1819 started business for himself, to book-selling afterward adding printing. Between 1825 and 1830 he wrote the Book of Scotland, and, in conjunction with his brother Robert, a Gazetteer of Scotland. In 1832 he started Chambers's Edinburgh Journal, six weeks in advance of the Penny Magazine; and soon thereafter he united with Robert in founding the business of W. & R. Chambers, the best known of whose many publications are, besides the Journal and a numerous series of educational works, a Miscellany, Papers for the People, the Cyclopædia of English Literature (2 vols.), and Chambers' Encyclopædia (10 vols.). In 1859 William founded and endowed an institute in his native town. He died in 1883, having shortly before received the offer of a baronetcy. He was made LL. D. of Edinburgh in 1872.

Chamisso (shä-mē'-sō; French, shȧ'-mē'-sō'), Adelbert von, German lyric poet, born in 1781 at the castle of Boncourt, in Champagne, France. In 1814 Count Rumjanzow, chancellor of the Russian empire, prepared an exploring expedition round the world, which Chamisso accompanied as naturalist. Subsequently he obtained a situation in the botanical garden of Berlin, and was made a member of the academy of science. As early as 1804–06, he, together with Varnhagen von Ense, published a Musen Almanach. In 1813 he wrote his original and amusing fiction called Peter Schlemihl. The character of his poetry is wild and gloomy, and he is fond of rugged and horrible subjects. Died, 1838.

Champlain (shăm'-plān'; French, shāɴ'-plăɴ'), Samuel de, a French naval officer and explorer, of the seventeenth century. During the reign of Henry IV., of France, he visited many parts of America, and formed the first French establishments at Quebec and Montreal. He was made governor of Quebec, from which he was driven by the English, in 1631. When peace was restored, he was reinstated. He wrote Voyages and Travels in New France, called Canada, in 1632. Died in 1635.

Champney, James Wells, an American painter and illustrator, born in Boston, Mass., 1843; studied at Paris, Antwerp, and Rome. He was especially distinguished as an illustrator and genre painter; elected an A. N. A. in 1882. Died, 1903.

Champollion (shäɴ'-pōl'-yôɴ'), Jean François, Egyptologist and discoverer, was born at Figeac, France, 1790; died in Paris, 1832. He was professor of history in the Lyceum of Grenoble, and afterward professor of Egyptian antiquities in the college of France, Paris. We are chiefly indebted to Champollion for the discovery of the method of interpreting Egyptian hieroglyphics. Among his principal works are Egypt under the Pharaohs, Monuments of Egypt and Nubia, and an Egyptian Grammar, etc., edited by his elder brother, Jean Jacques Champollion, who was also a distinguished archæologist.

Channing, Edward, historian; born in Dorchester, Mass., 1856; graduate of Harvard, 1878; Ph. D., 1880; instructor, 1883–87, assistant professor, 1887–97, professor of history since 1897, Harvard. Author: The United States of America, 1765–1865; History of the United States; Town and County Government in the English Colonies of North America; Narragansett Planters; The Planting of a Nation in the New World; etc. Collaborator with late Justin Winsor on Narrative and Critical History of America; with Albert B. Hart in Guide to Study of American History; and with Thomas W. Higginson in English History for American Readers.

Channing, William Ellery, founder of American Unitarianism, and one of the most elegant writers this country has produced, was born in Newport, R. I., 1780; graduated from Harvard in 1798; ordained minister of the Federal Street church in Boston in 1803. During the earlier years of his ministry his theological peculiarities had little prominence in his discourses, and in consequence he stood upon friendly terms with all orthodox churches. In 1819, however, he preached a sermon at the ordination of the Rev. Jared Sparks, in which he advocated the Unitarian doctrine with so much zeal and ability, that he was termed the "apostle of Unitarianism." This involved him in controversy, a thing which he naturally loathed. Nevertheless, to the end of his life he preserved a devoutly Christian heart, shrinking with the delicate instinct of a pious nature from everything cold, one-sided, and dogmatic, whether Unitarian or Trinitarian. In 1821 he received the title of D. D. from Harvard university, on account of the high talent he had exhibited in his tractate on the Evidences of Christianity, his Address on War, and his Sermons. In 1822 he visited Europe, and made the acquaintance of several great authors, notably Wordsworth and Coleridge, both of whom were strongly impressed in his favor. Coleridge said of him: "He has the love of wisdom and the wisdom of love." In 1823 he published an Essay on National Literature; in 1826, Remarks on the Character and Writings of John Milton; in 1829, the Character and Writings of Fenelon; in 1835, a work in opposition to Negro Slavery; and, in 1838, an essay on Self Culture. Besides these, he wrote a variety of other essays and treatises, all characterized by vigor, eloquence, pure taste, and a lofty tone of moral earnestness. He died in 1842 at Bennington, Vt.

Chantrey (chăn'-trĭ), Sir Francis, English sculptor, was born in 1781, died in 1841. His works include numerous busts of distinguished men of his time, including Wellington, Watt, and Canning, the "Sleeping Children" in Lichfield cathedral, many sculptures in Westminster abbey, the bronze statue of Pitt in Hanover square, London, and the statue of Washington in the state house at Boston. He bequeathed his large fortune chiefly for the encouragement of art.

Chapman, Frank Michler, ornithologist; born Englewood, N. J., 1864; academic education. Curator ornithology American museum natural history since 1908. President Linnæan society New York, elected 1897. Author: Handbook of Birds of Eastern North America; Bird-Life, a Guide to the Study of Our Common Birds; Bird Studies with a Camera; A Color Key to North American Birds; The Economic Value of Birds to the State; The Warblers of North America; also numerous papers on birds and mammals. Chapman, George, English poet, born 1559, died 1634. He published a translation of the Iliad in English ballad measure, and afterward translated the Odyssey, the Homeric hymns, and portions of Ovid, Terence, Musæus, and Petrarch, and wrote many plays. He was associated with Jonson, Marston, and others in writing the comedy of Eastward Ho! for which they were imprisoned by King James.

Charcot (shär'-kō'), Jean Martin, pathologist, was born at Paris, 1825, studied medicine at Paris, where he became a professor, doctor at the Salpetriere hospital, and a member of the institute. He contributed much to our knowledge of chronic and nervous diseases, and made hypnotism a scientific study. He published numerous works on these subjects. Died, 1893.

Charlemagne (shär'-lĕ-mān), (Charles the Great). See page 430.

Charles I., king of England, second son of James I., was born in 1600, proclaimed king on the death of his father in March, 1625, and married to Henrietta Maria of France, daughter of Henry IV., in the May following. The duke of Buckingham, who had been his father's minion, became his confidential minister until his death. His reign is chiefly celebrated for the great civil war between the king and the parliament which began in 1642, and ended in the capture of the monarch, who was brought to trial in January, 1649, before what was styled a high court of justice, as a traitor to the country. Sentence of death being passed upon him, he was, on January 30, 1649, beheaded on a scaffold erected in the street near the windows of the banqueting house at Whitehall.

Charles II., king of England, son of Charles I., born in St. James's palace, London, in 1630; was at The Hague, in Holland, when his father was beheaded. He assumed the royal title, and was proclaimed king by the Scots; landed in Scotland, and was crowned at Scone. Marching into England, he was defeated by Cromwell at Worcester, September 3, 1651, and fled to France. By the policy of General Monk, after Cromwell's death, he was restored to his crown and kingdom in 1660, an event known as the restoration. Charles II. was an easy-going man, and is known in history as the "merry monarch." His reign was an inglorious one for England, though it is distinguished by the passing of the habeas corpus act, one of the great bulwarks of English liberty next to the magna charta. Died, 1685.

Charles V., surnamed "the wise," king of France 1364–80, was the son of King John II., and was born 1337. His father being made prisoner by the English at the battle of Poitiers, on September 19, 1356, he assumed the regency. His father died April 8, 1364, and Charles ascended the throne. By his cautious policy he rescued the kingdom from some of its troubles, and reëstablished the power of the crown, which had been much shaken. Died, 1380.

Charles VI., "the mad," or the "beloved," born 1368, died October 21, 1422. He succeeded his father Charles V. in 1380, and France was under the oppressive rule of his uncles until he dismissed them in 1388. He reigned wisely till 1392, when his weak mind became deranged. His uncles again seized the reins, Philip "the bold" of Burgundy gaining the ascendancy. A contest between him and the duke of Orleans, the king's brother, divided the nation. Philip's successor, John "the fearless," caused the murder of Orleans, whose faction became known as that of the Armagnacs. Henry V. of England invaded the distracted land and won a great victory at Agincourt in 1415. Philip "the good" of Burgundy, eager to avenge the murder of John "the fearless," perpetrated in the presence of the dauphin, concluded a treaty at Troyes, May 21, 1420, by which Henry was to succeed to the French throne. Charles died, leaving most of France in English hands. His son by Isabella of Bavaria, Charles VII., succeeded him.

Charles VII., "the victorious," born 1403, died July 22, 1461. He was the fifth son of Charles VI. and Isabella, and became by the death of his brothers heir apparent in 1416. On the death of Charles VI. in 1422 Henry VI. of England was proclaimed king of France at St. Denis, and his authority was generally recognized. The progress of the English made the position of Charles apparently hopeless, when in 1428 Joan of Arc came forward, inspired new ardor, and delivered Orleans, 1429. Charles was crowned at Rheims, the people rose in his behalf, and the English were forced to yield. Peace and order were restored, a regular army was organized, and reforms were instituted, in which Jacques Coeur, the richest merchant of the time, had a great share. By 1453 the English had lost all but Calais. The freedom of the Gallican church was secured by the pragmatic sanction of 1438. Charles's later years were embittered by his son Louis XI., who succeeded him.

Charles IX., king of France, second son of Henry II. and Catharine de' Medici, born 1550, died May 30, 1574. He succeeded his brother Francis II. in 1560, under the regency of his mother. Soon after the Huguenots took up arms, and then followed their defeat at Dreux, 1562, the assassination of Guise, and the treaty of peace known as the edict of Amboise, 1563. Intervals of war and peace ensued. The battles of Jarnac and Moncontour were fought in 1569, after which an apparent reconciliation was effected, succeeded in 1572 by the massacre of St. Bartholomew. The assent of Charles to the massacre seems to have been wrung from him by his mother. He manifested deep remorse, and died after terrible sufferings.

Charles X., king of France, the grandson of Louis XV., was born, 1757. He received the title Comte d'Artois, and in 1773 married Maria Theresa of Savoy. After the fall of the Bastille, in 1789, he headed the first emigration of nobles and took the lead in the attempts made to restore the monarchy. Under Louis XVIII., Artois headed the royalist party, and by the death of that monarch became king, under the title of Charles X. At first he was popular with all parties, but it was soon plain that he wished to make his rule as absolute as that of the old French monarchy. The people became discontented, and a struggle ensued with the chamber of deputies. On July 26, 1830, the king signed the five well-known ordinances, putting an end to the freedom of the press, making a new mode of election and dissolving the chamber that had just been elected. Paris at once took up arms. In three days the revolution was finished, Charles was driven from the capital, and Louis Philippe declared king. Charles lived the remainder of his life in exile. He died at Görz, Austria, 1836.

Charles V., of Germany. See page 438.

Charles X., king of Sweden, the son of the count Palatine, was born at Nyköping, 1622. He took part in the thirty years' war, and on the abdication of his cousin, Queen Christina, 1654, succeeded to the throne of a kingdom impoverished by her extravagance. He overran Poland in 1655; forced the great elector to acknowledge his lordship over Prussia; and crushed the forces of the Polish king anew in a terrible three days' battle at Warsaw, July 28–30, 1656. His next war was with the Danes, when he crossed the great and little belt on the ice, and extorted the treaty of Roeskild, 1658, which gave to Sweden the southern parts of the Scandinavian peninsula, heretofore Danish. In 1659 he was driven from a new attack on Copenhagen by help of the Brandenburgers and the Dutch; and he died suddenly at Gothenburg, 1660.

Charles XII., king of Sweden, son of Charles XI., and a warlike prince, was born 1682. He ascended the throne at the age of fifteen. He had to cope with Denmark, Russia, and Poland combined against him; he foiled the Danes at Copenhagen, the Russians at Narva, and Augustus II. of Poland at Riga; but, being trapped in Russia, and compelled to spend a winter there, he was, in July, 1709, attacked by Peter the Great at Pultowa, and defeated, so that he had to take refuge with the Turks at Bender; here he was again attacked, captured, and conveyed to Demotica, but escaping, he found his way miraculously back to Sweden, and making peace with the czar, commenced an attack on Norway, but was killed by a musket-shot at the siege of Frederikshald. Charles XII. was the last of the Swedish kings. His appearance among the luxurious kings and knights of the North at the time, Carlyle compared to "the bursting of a cataract of bomb-shells in a dull ballroom." Died in 1718.

Charles the Bold, duke of Burgundy, son of Philip the Good, born 1433, died 1477. He fought at Gavre in his father's ranks in 1452, engaged in the "war of the public weal" in France, forcing Louis XI. to yield to the demands of the confederates, and after humbling Liége in 1466 and destroying Dinant, he succeeded Philip, in June, 1467, as duke of Burgundy. His wife Isabella of Bourbon died in 1465, and he married in 1468 Margaret of York, sister of Edward IV. In 1469 Sigismund of Austria mortgaged to him his possession in Alsace. With an army of 30,000 men, Charles began a war with Louis XI. in 1471, and penetrated into Normandy, committing terrible devastations. A truce followed. In 1472 Gelderland, his fifth duchy, was acquired. Possessed of the most formidable power, Charles aimed to erect a kingdom out of his realms. Louis united his enemies against him, and Alsace was lost; but in 1475 Charles, after joining with Edward IV., conquered Lorraine. In 1476 he invaded Switzerland, but his forces were overwhelmed at Granson and at Morat, and he lost Lorraine. He attempted to recover it, and besieged Nancy. Here on January 5, 1477, René, duke of Lorraine, vanquished his army, Charles falling in the fight.

Charles Martel, duke of Austrasia, was born about A. D. 689; died 741. He was the natural son of Pepin d'Heristal, and succeeded his father in the dukedom in 714. As mayor of the palace he possessed the whole regal power, which he administered with great success, and gained many victories, the principal of which was over the Saracens under their general, Abdurrahman, whom he defeated with great slaughter between Tours and Poitiers, in 732. It was in consequence of this victory that he was called Martel, or "the hammer." Charles had never taken the title of king, but only that of mayor of the palace. On the death of Thierry in 737, he omitted to declare a successor to the throne, and continued to administer affairs with the title of duke of the Franks. At his death he divided his dominions between his sons Carloman and Pepin. The latter became the first king of France of the Carlovingian race, which name was taken from the founder, Charles Martel.

Charlevoix (shȧr'-lē-vwä'), Pierre François Xavier de, a noted French traveler and historian, born at St. Quentin, 1682. He became a member of the society of Jesuits when only sixteen years old. In 1720 he visited Canada, went up the St. Lawrence river and through the great lakes, and reaching the Mississippi through the Illinois river, sailed down to New Orleans, went from there to Santo Domingo, and thence to France, which he reached after an absence of two years. He afterward published a History of New France (Canada). He died, 1761.

Charlton, John, English artist, was born at Bamborough, Northumberland, 1849; studied at Newcastle school of arts and S. Kensington; exhibited at royal academy 1870, and regularly since that time. Paintings: "A Winter's Day"; "The Hall Fire"; "Rescue"; "Huntsman Courtship"; "Gone Away"; "Stag at Bay"; "British Artillery entering Enemy's Lines at Tel-el-Kebir"; "Ulundi"; "Reynard's Requiem"; "Bad News from the Front"; "Incident in the Charge of the Light Brigade," etc.; the "Procession of Royal Princes passing through Trafalgar Square to Westminster Abbey," 1887, painted for the queen; also by command of her majesty the queen the official picture of the thanksgiving service in front of St. Paul's cathedral on the occasion of the royal diamond jubilee, entitled "God Save the Queen"; and "The Funeral of Queen Victoria"; also a great many military, sporting, and other subjects for the Graphic.

Charron (shȧ'-rôɴ'), Pierre, philosopher and theologian, born at Paris, 1541. After being admitted to the bar he took orders, and became a leader of the moderate Catholics. He assailed the league in his Discours Chretiens, vindicated Catholicism in Les Trois Verites, and in his chief work, De la Sagesse, took a sceptical attitude toward all forms of religion. He was a friend of Montaigne, from whose essays he borrowed freely. Died, 1603.

Chase, Salmon Portland, American jurist and statesman, was born in New Hampshire in 1808. He was sent to the house of representatives and to the United States senate from Ohio, and was elected governor of that state. Appointed secretary of the treasury by President Lincoln, at the outbreak of the civil war, he conducted the finances with rare skill and success. Appointed chief-justice of the supreme court in 1864, he held this office at his death in 1873.

Chase, William Merritt, American artist; was born at Franklin, Ind., 1849; early studied under B. F. Hayes in Indianapolis, J. O. Eaton, New York, A. Wagner and Piloty, Munich. Specialties, portraits and figure pieces.

Chateaubriand (shȧ'-tō'-brē'-äɴ'), Vicomte de, François Auguste, French author, was born 1768 at St. Malo, in Bretagne. He traveled in America 1791-92, and while still here learned of the flight and arrest of Louis XVI. He immediately returned to France, but found himself unable to stem the revolutionary tide, and so retired to England. In 1800 he returned to Paris, and wrote for the Mercure de France. In this journal he first printed his tale of Atala, with a preface lauding the first consul, Bonaparte. Its success was remarkable, but his Génie du Christianisme was even more remarkable. Bonaparte appointed Chateaubriand secretary to the embassy in Rome, and in 1803 sent him as ambassador to the little republic of Valais. In 1806 he commenced his pilgrimage to the holy land, visited Greece, Palestine, Alexandria, and Carthage, and returned through Spain to France in 1807. He was created a peer of France 1815, was ambassador at London in 1822, and minister of foreign affairs 1823-24. Died at Paris, 1848.

Chaucer (chô'-sĕr), Geoffrey, the "father of English poetry," was born, most probably, about 1340, though the traditional date is 1328. It has been said that he studied at Cambridge, and afterward removed to Oxford. While at the university he wrote The Court of Love, and The Book of Troilus and Cressida. At one period he seems to have turned his attention to law, and to have become a member of the Inner Temple. In 1359 he served under Edward III. in his French campaign, and was made prisoner. The date of his return from captivity and of his subsequent marriage cannot now be ascertained. After his marriage he began to mix in public affairs. He was sent on an embassy to Genoa in 1372, and on his return was appointed comptroller of the customs for wools, and in the same year the king granted him a pitcher of wine daily for life. In 1377 he proceeded to Flanders in the retinue of Sir Thomas Percy, afterward earl of Worcester; and for several years thereafter he was employed in embassies and other business connected with the public service. He died at London in 1400, and was buried in Westminster abbey. He was a master of science, the theology and the literature of his time. His poems are numerous, and exhibit every variety of poetical excellence. They include The Flower and the Leaf; The Romaunt of the Rose; The Canterbury Tales; The Book of the Duchess; The House of Fame, and The Legend of Good Women.

Cheops (kē'-ŏps), or Khufu, a king of Egypt of the fourth dynasty. He built the great pyramid, and spent 1,060 talents in vegetables alone for the workmen engaged on it. He changed that government into a despotic tyranny which had previously been a limited monarchy, and died, after reigning fifty-six years, hated by his people. According to Lepsius he lived about 2800–2700 B. C.

Cherbuliez (shâr'-bü'-lyā'), Victor, French novelist and critic, was born at Geneva, 1829, and studied there, at Paris, Bonn, and Berlin, first mathematics, then philology and philosophy; after which he lived in Geneva as a teacher, until his call to Paris in 1864 to join the staff of the Revue des Deux Mondes. In 1882 he became a member of the French academy. His strong and striking Comte Kostia, 1863, was followed by a series of novels which, always clever and original, lifted him into the front rank of French writers of fiction. His best works are: Le Roman d'une honnete Femme,; La Revanche de Joseph Noirel; Meta Holdenis; Miss Rovel; Samuel Brohl et Cie; L'Idee de Jean Teterol; La Ferme du Choquard; La Vocation du Comte Ghislain; and Le Secret du Precepteur. He published also political studies on Germany and Spain, and died, 1899.

Cherubini (kā'-rōō-bē'-nē), Maria Luigi Carlo Zenobo Salvatore, Italian composer, was born at Florence in 1760. He was naturalized in France, and settled in Paris, the scene of his greatest triumphs, where he composed operas, of which the chief were Iphigenia in Aulis, and Les deux Journees, or "The Water Carrier," his masterpiece; also a number of sacred pieces and requiems, all of the highest merit. Died, 1842.

Chesterfield, Philip Dormer Stanhope, Earl of, English politician, writer, and man of fashion, was born in 1694, and educated at Cambridge. He represented St. Germans, Cornwall, in the house of commons, and in 1726 succeeded to the earldom. He was distinguished at the court of George II., and was sent as ambassador extraordinary to Holland in 1728. He was made a knight of the garter in 1730, and received the appointment of lord steward of the household. He was found among the opponents of Sir Robert Walpole. In 1745 he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and afterward became secretary of state. He is now more known by his Advice to His Son than by his public services. Died, 1773.

Chesterton, Gilbert Keith, English journalist and author; born at Campden Hill, Kensington, 1874; educated at St. Paul's school. Attended classes at Slade school; began reviewing art books for the Bookman, and then for the Speaker; since then has contributed to Daily News, Literature, Pall Mall Magazine, Bookman, Speaker, Black and White, Echo, World, Clarion, English Illustrated Magazine, Bystander, Fortnightly and Independent Review, Illustrated London News. Author: The Wild Knight; Defendant; Greybeards at Play; Twelve Types; Browning (English Men of Letters); The Napoleon of Notting Hill; The Club of Queer Trades; Heretics; Dickens; The Man who was Thursday; Orthodoxy; All Things Considered.

Chevalier (shĕ-vä'-lyā'), Michel, French economist, was born at Limoges, 1806, and trained as an engineer. An ardent St. Simonian, he attached himself to Enfantin, and helped to compile the propagandist Livre Nouveau. After six months' imprisonment in 1832, he retracted all he had written in the Globe against Christianity and marriage. He was sent by Thiers to inquire into water and railway communication in the United States; was made a councillor of state in 1838; and in 1840 professor of political economy in the Collège de France. In 1845 he was returned by Aveyron to the chamber of deputies. After the revolution of 1848 he made onslaughts that were never met upon Louis Blanc's socialism in articles collected as L'Organisation du Travail, and Questions politiques et sociales. As a freetrader he aided Cobden in carrying into effect in 1860 the commercial treaty between France and England, becoming a senator and grand officer of the legion of honor. He died at Montpellier, 1879.

Chevreul (shĕ'-vrûl'), Michel Eugène, French chemist, born at Angers, 1786, studied chemistry at the Collège de France in Paris. He lectured at the Collège Charlemagne, and held a technical post at the Gobelins. In 1826 he entered the academy of sciences, and in 1830 became director of the museum of natural history. Early discoveries were those of margarine, oleine, and stearine; and these studies and his theory of saponification opened up vast industries. Between 1828 and 1864 he studied colors. This patriarch of the scientific world died in 1889, his hundredth birthday having been celebrated three years before with great enthusiasm.

Cheyne (chā'-nē), Thomas Kelly, biblical scholar, joint-editor of the Encyclopædia Biblica, and author of Critica Biblica, was born in London, 1841. Educated at Merchant Taylors' school and Worcester college, Oxford, he became fellow of Balliol college in 1868; D. D., Edinburgh; Litt. D. He was rector of Tendring in Essex from 1880 to 1885, when he became Oriel professor of the interpretation of scripture at Oxford and canon of Rochester. A member of the Old Testament Revision company, he has contributed much to magazines and reviews. His chief books are The Prophecies of Isaiah; Exposition of Jeremiah and Lamentations; The Book of Psalms; The Origin of the Psalter; Founders of Old Testament Criticism; Introduction to Isaiah; Outlines of History of Israel, etc.

Choate (chōt), Joseph Hodges, lawyer, diplomat, ambassador of United States to England, 1899–1905; born in Salem, Mass., 1832; graduate of Harvard, A. B., 1852, Harvard law school, 1854; LL. D., Harvard, Yale, Cambridge; D. C. L., Oxford. Admitted to Massachusetts bar, 1855; New York, 1856; settled in New York, 1856. Identified with many famous cases; one of the committee of seventy which broke up the Tweed ring, 1871; secured the reinstatement of General Fitz John Porter to his army rank, etc.; governor of New York hospital since 1877 (chairman of committee of elections); noted as a public and after-dinner speaker. Author of Addresses on Abraham Lincoln, Admiral Farragut, Rufus Choate, etc. Elected bencher of the Inner Temple, England, 1905.

Choate, Rufus, American lawyer, statesman, and orator, was born at Essex, Mass., in 1799. After graduating at Dartmouth college, he entered upon the study of law at Cambridge and in Washington. After practicing at Danvers, Salem, and Boston, successively, he was elected to the senate in 1841, which he quitted in 1845. After the death of Daniel Webster, Choate became the recognized leader of the Massachusetts bar, and acquired quite a national reputation. His foresight led him to anticipate the civil war, and to do more than was by some considered wise to conciliate the South. As an advocate and orator, he may be classed with the most distinguished masters of modern eloquence. Died at Halifax, Nova Scotia, 1859.

Choiseul (shwä'-zül'), Étienne François, Duke of, French statesman and diplomat, was born in 1719. He gained a high rank in the army, and was then employed as a diplomatist at Rome and Vienna, and honored with a peerage. He became prime minister of France, it was reported, through the influence of Madame de Pompadour. In 1761 he negotiated the secret treaty with the king of Spain, known as the "family compact." In 1763 he terminated the war between France and England by bringing about the treaty of Paris. In 1770 he was dismissed from office, and exiled to one of his estates. He died in 1785.

Chopin (*shō̆'-pă*ɴ*'*), Frédéric François, Polish pianist and composer, was born, 1809. His waltzes, mazurkas, and other compositions are peculiar in melody, rhythm, and harmony, and have a great charm. He was one of the first pianists, and his playing, like his music, had a captivating grace. He spent most of his life in Paris, where he died, 1849.

Chosroes (kŏs'-rō-ēz), or Khosru I., king of Persia from A. D. 531 to 579. His reign was marked by great victories in war and wise conduct in peace. His wars were chiefly against the Greek empire, from which he took Antioch and other cities of Syria, and forced its emperors to pay him tribute. He enlarged his kingdom, and made his subjects love him by ruling justly and kindly. He lived to be eighty years old, and the forty-eight years of his reign have been called the golden age of Persia.

Chosroes II., king of Persia, grandson of Chosroes I., came to the throne in 590. He also was a great conqueror, but cared more for his own glory than for the good of the people. He sent out large armies to fight the Greeks, while he enjoyed at home the greatest splendor and luxury. His palaces, of which he built a new one every year, were wonders of the world. He had fifty thousand horses and twelve thousand wives; and his thrones were built of gold, inlaid with precious jewels. About A. D. 622 the Roman emperor Heraclius entered Persia with a strong army, destroyed the palaces and captured the treasures of Chosroes, and in less than six years reconquered all the territories that the Persian king had taken. At last his subjects, led by his own son, rebelled against him, and put him to death, 628, after he had been king for about thirty-eight years.

Christian II., king of Denmark and Norway, was born 1481, died 1559. He was charged at the age of twenty to suppress an insurrection in Norway, and nearly extirpated the Norwegian nobility. In 1513 he succeeded his father John, under whom the union of Calmar had been reëstablished in Denmark and Norway, while Sweden was in rebellion. He proceeded to subdue Sweden, where he expected aid from the treason of Gustavus Trolle. He was at first unsuccessful, but made a formidable invasion in 1520. The Swedish regent, Sten Sture, was mortally wounded, and the barons were forced to recognize Christian as king on the promise of a general amnesty. Stockholm and Calmar held out, but both were soon reduced. Christian was crowned, and a fearful series of executions ensued. Sweden found a deliverer in Gustavus Vasa, while the Danes rose against Christian and gave their throne to Frederick, duke of Holstein. Christian fled with a fleet containing his family and treasures, the national records, and the crown jewels, to Antwerp. Thus ended the union of Calmar, 1523. He attempted to recover his throne, and in 1531 was acknowledged king in Norway. He was soon forced to surrender to the Danes, and was imprisoned for the rest of his life, passing seventeen years in a terrible dungeon on the island of Alsen.

Christian IV., king of Denmark and Norway, and duke of Schleswig-Holstein, born in Zealand 1577, and elected successor to the throne in 1588. He assumed the sceptor in 1593. From 1611 he carried on a successful war, known as the Kalmarian war, against Charles IX. of Sweden, and his successor, Gustavus Adolphus, which ended in an advantageous peace in 1613. As leader of the Protestants in the thirty years' war, Christian was not successful. His legislative and financial reforms, together with his love and patronage of the arts and sciences, gained the esteem of his people. Died, 1648.

Christian IX., king of Denmark, 1863–1906, was born near Schleswig 1818, died at Copenhagen 1906. Christina (krĭs-tē'-nă), queen of Sweden, born in 1626; succeeded her father, Gustavus Adolphus, in 1632. After her coronation in 1650, she fell under the influence of favorites, and ceased to interest herself in state affairs. She resigned the crown to her cousin, Charles Gustavus, in 1654, was baptized by the pope, and lived for some time at Paris. On the death of Charles Gustavus, in 1660, she vainly endeavored to regain the throne. She died at Rome in 1689. Christina was one of the most accomplished women of her time, a remarkable linguist, and the friend and correspondent of Gassendi, Descartes, Salmasius, and others of the most famous literati of that age.

Cid Campeador (thēTH kăm'-pā-ä-thōr'), Ruy, or Rodrigo Diaz de Bivar, hero of Spanish fiction, aided Sancho of Castile against his brother, Alfonso, king of Aragon, but on the death of Sancho acknowledged Alfonso as king of Castile. He lost the favor of Alfonso, and retired from his court, but obtained some aid from him in capturing the city of Valencia from the Moors, which he ruled till his death.

Cimabue (chē'-mä-bōō'-ā), Giovanni, Italian artist, one of the restorers of the art of painting in Italy, which had fallen into neglect during the barbarism of the dark ages; born at Florence in 1240, died about 1300. The exhibition of his table of "The Virgin" for the Rucellai chapel in Santa Maria Novella was the occasion of a public festival. Except the "Madonna," little of his work remains.

Cimon (sī'-mon), Athenian commander, was the son of Miltiades, the conqueror at Marathon. With his patron Aristides, he was placed over the Athenian contingent to the allied fleet, which, under Pausanias, continued the war against Persia, 477 B. C. His greatest exploit was his encounter with a Persian fleet at the river Eurymedon, 466, when he destroyed or captured 300 out of 350 ships, and defeated the land forces on the same day. He likewise drove the Persians from Thrace, Caria, and Lycia; and expended much of the money which he had obtained by the recovery of his patrimony in Thrace upon the improvement of Athens. He advocated a close alliance with Sparta; and when the Helots revolted, he twice led an army to support the Spartans; but the second time, having lost the confidence of his allies, he was ignominiously dismissed. At Athens he was opposed by the democracy, headed by Pericles, who procured his ostracism. He was recalled in 454, and was instrumental in obtaining a five years' armistice with Sparta: He died in 449 B. C. at the siege of a Cyprian town.

Cincinnatus (sĭn'-sĭ-nā'-tŭs), Lucius Quintius, a Roman consul regarded by the later Romans as the model of antique virtue, born about 519 B. C. About 460 B. C. he was chosen consul, and two years later was made dictator. When the messengers from Rome arrived to tell him of his new dignity they found him plowing on his small farm. After a dictatorship of sixteen days he returned to his simple country life. He was again, when eighty years old, made dictator; died about 430 B. C.

Cinna, Lucius Cornelius, Roman patrician who supported Marius; Sulla, after driving Marius from Rome, and before setting out against Mithridates, allowed Cinna to be elected consul on his swearing not to disturb the existing constitution. No sooner, however, had he entered on office, 87 B. C., than he impeached Sulla, and agitated for Marius' recall. Cinna and Marius next declared themselves consuls after a cruel massacre of the Roman citizens. Marius died a few days later; and Cinna in 84 B. C. prepared to meet Sulla, but was slain by his own disaffected troops at Brundisium. During his fourth consulate his daughter Cornelia was married to Julius Cæsar.

Cinq-Mars (săN'-măr'), Henri Coiffier de Ruzé, Marquis de, French courtier, was born in 1620, the second son of the marshal Marquis d'Effiat. At nineteen he was chief equerry to Louis XIII., but already in his dreams he was a duke and peer of France, and husband of the princess Maria of Gonzaga. Finding his projects derided by Richelieu, his former patron, he conspired with the king's brother, Duke Gaston of Orleans, to murder the cardinal. With this was combined a wider plot with Spain; but the conspiracy was discovered, and Cinq-Mars, with De Thou, was executed at Lyons, September, 1642.

Clairaut (klĕ'-rō'), Alexis Claude, French mathematician, was born in Paris, 1713, and died there, 1765. Admitted at eighteen to the academy of sciences, he is remembered by his Figure de la Terre, his theory of the lunar apogee, and his computation of the return of Halley's comet.

Claude (klôd) of Lorraine, or Claude Gelée, French landscape painter, born at Chamagne, in Lorraine, 1600; died in Rome, 1682. He was originally, it is said, apprenticed to a pastry cook; but at the age of twelve, being left an orphan, he found a home with an elder brother, who was a carver in wood at Freiburg, and there showed some signs of genius. He afterward studied at Rome and at Naples. In return for his teaching, in the house of Agostino Tassi at Rome, he ground his master's colors, and did all the drudgery of the house. He made a tour in Italy, France, and Germany, suffering much through poverty; but, in 1627, he returned finally to Rome, where he speedily made himself famous. His works are remarkable for their rich coloring, and for the wonderful vividness of their representations of natural scenery.

Claudianus (klô-dĭ-ā'-nŭs), Claudius, the last of the great Latin poets, came from Alexandria to Rome in 395 A. D., and obtained patrician dignity by favor of Stilicho, whose fall, 408, he seems not to have long survived. A pagan, he wrote first in Greek, though he was of Roman extraction; but in Gibbon's words, he "assumed in his mature age the familiar use and absolute command of Latin." We have two epic poems by him, Raptus Proserpinæ and the fragmentary Gigantomachia, besides panegyrics on Honorius and Stilicho, Eidyllia, Epigrammata, etc.

Claudius (klô'-dĭ-ŭs), Marcus Aurelius Claudius Gothicus, Roman emperor, born in Illyria in A. D. 214. He was of a poor family, but won fame as a soldier, and when the emperor Gallienus was murdered the soldiers made him emperor. The next year he gained a great victory over the Goths in Macedonia, from which he took the name of Gothicus. He died in 270 from a pestilence which broke out in the camp of the Goths and spread to his own army.

Claudius, Tiberius Drusus Nero Germanicus, Roman emperor, born at Lugdunum (Lyons), 10 B. C. He was weak and timid in his youth, and was treated with neglect even by his mother, for which Augustus left him a fortune when he died, to which Tiberius largely added on his death. When Caligula was killed (A. D. 41), he was made emperor by the soldiers. This was the first time that an emperor was chosen by the army. He was disposed to be a kind and just ruler, but was led to do some cruel things by his wives and favorites. The conquest of Britain was begun by him, and it would probably have become a Roman state had not Claudius been recalled to Rome; from his conquests in Germany he took the title of Germanicus. He did much good for his people and greatly improved Rome, building the harbor of Ostia and the Claudian aqueduct, which supplied the city with water. He was poisoned by his wife Agrippina, who wanted the empire for her son Nero, in A. D. 54.

Clausius (klô'-sĭ-ŭs), Rudolf Julius Emanuel, German physicist, was born at Köslin, Pomerania, 1822. He was educated at Berlin, and held professorships of physics at Zürich, Würzburg, and Bonn. He discovered the principle of virial in mathematical physics and published a number of books on physical subjects. He defended the scientific possibility of miracles. Died, 1888.

Claxton, Kate (Mrs. Charles A. Stevenson), actress; born Somerville, N. J., 1850; daughter Spencer Wallace Cone; first professional engagement with Miss Lotta, Chicago, 1870; fall of same year joined Augustin Daly's Fifth Avenue theater, New York; became member of A. M. Palmer's Union Square theater, spring of 1872, playing principally comedy rôles. Created part of Louise in The Two Orphans. First starring tour, 1876; married 1878 Charles A. Stevenson.

Claxton, Philander P., United States commissioner of education since 1911; born in Tennessee, 1862; A. B., university of Tennessee, 1882, A. M., 1887; graduate student Johns Hopkins, 1884-85; studied in Germany, 1885-86; visited schools in Europe, 1897. Superintendent of schools, Kinston, N. C., 1883-84, Wilson, 1886-88, Asheville, 1888-93; professor of pedagogy and German, 1893-96, professor of pedagogy, North Carolina normal and industrial college, 1896-1902; professor of education, university of Tennessee, 1902-11.

Clay, Alexander Stephens, lawyer, United States senator, was born on a farm, Cobb county, Ga., 1853; graduate of Hiawassee college, 1875; taught school two years; admitted to bar, 1877; afterward practiced law; member Marietta city council, 1880–82; Georgia general assembly, 1884–87, speaker, 1886–87; member and president senate, 1892–94; chairman Georgia state democratic committee, 1894–97. United States senator 1897-1910. Died, 1910.

Clay, Henry, American statesman, born 1777 in Hanover county, Va. He studied law and was admitted to the bar, 1797. In 1806 was elected to congress, and again in 1809 was chosen senator. In 1811 he was sent to the house of representatives, where he was immediately elected speaker. A strong advocate of nationality, he denounced the claims put forth by England as to right of search; he was a strenuous supporter of the war with that country, and in consequence was sent, in 1814, as one of the commissioners to sign the treaty of peace at Ghent. On his return he exerted all his talents in favor of the independence of South America, and labored hard to eradicate all European influence from the American continent. Clay, however, is best known as the author of the famous Missouri compromise, and of the compromise of 1850, known as Clay's "omnibus" measure. In 1824 he was an unsuccessful candidate for president, but was made secretary of state by J. Q. Adams, the successful candidate. In 1832 he again ran against Jackson and was defeated. He was then returned to the United States senate, in which he played a leading part for many years ensuing, especially in the tariff compromise of 1833, whereby a conflict with South Carolina was averted, and in resistance to the new financial policy of President Van Buren in 1837, whereby the treasury was to be divorced from all connection with banks. Clay was again a candidate for president before the first whig national convention in 1839, but Harrison was nominated and elected. Harrison's death and Tyler's course brought Clay forward as the choice of his party in 1844, when an unsuccessful effort was made to elect him. Clay's name was once more presented to the whig national convention of 1848, but Taylor was nominated over him and elected. He had in 1842 bidden farewell to the senate, but was persuaded to return to it after 1844, and bore a leading part in effecting the slavery compromise of 1850. He returned to Washington from Kentucky for the last time near the close of 1851, and was soon prostrated by disease, under which he gradually sank until his death. Though not successful as an aspirant to the presidency, he was a gallant party chief, an eloquent orator, a skillful legislator, wielding unequaled influence, not only over his friends, but even over his political antagonists. Died, 1852.

Clayton, John Middleton, American statesman and diplomat, born in Delaware, 1796; graduated from Yale, 1815, and became a noted lawyer. He was United States senator 1829–37, 1845–49, and 1851–56. During 1849-50 he was secretary of state under President Taylor and negotiated with the British government the historic Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Died, 1856.

D., university of Missouri, 1902; Litt. D., Oxford, England, 1907; apprenticed to printer at twelve; short time was Mississippi pilot; became, 1861, private secretary to his brother when latter was appointed territorial secretary, Nevada. City editor of Virginia City (Nev.) Enterprise, 1862; alternated between mining and newspaper work until he began lecturing and writing books; founded, 1884, publishing house of C. L. Webster & Co., failure of which involved him in heavy losses; paid its debts by proceeds of lectures and books; traveled extensively. Author: The Jumping Frog; The Innocents Abroad; The Gilded Age (with C. D. Warner); Roughing It; Adventures of Tom Sawyer; A Tramp Abroad; The Prince and the Pauper; Life on the Mississippi; The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn; A Yankee at the Court of King Arthur; The £1,000,000 Bank Note; Puddinhead Wilson; Tom Sawyer Abroad; A Dog's Tale; Eve's Diary; A Horse's Tale; Christian Science; Autobiography of Mark Twain. Died, 1910.

Clement XIV., Giovanni Vincenzo Antonio Ganganelli, born, 1705, at St. Arcangelo, near Rimini, died 1774. At the age of eighteen he entered the order of Minorites, and studied philosophy and theology, which he then successfully taught. Benedict XIV. appointed him to the important post of counsellor to the inquisition, and under Clement XIII. he was made a cardinal. On the death of Clement XIII. he succeeded to the papal chair, 1769. Clement XIV. was remarkable for liberality of mind, address as a statesman, sound learning, and mildness of character. He cherished the arts and sciences, and was the founder of the Clementine museum, which, by the additions of Pius VI. and Pius VII., became the chief ornament of the vatican.

Cleomenes III. (klē-ŏm'-ē-nēz), king of Sparta, reigned 236–220 B. C. He reëstablished the institutions of Lycurgus, and made a new distribution of the lands, relinquishing his own property. The Achæans, beaten by him, invoked the aid of Macedon; Antigonus Doson entered the Peloponnesus and routed the Spartans in the battle of Sellasia. Cleomenes fled to Egypt, where he killed himself, after vainly attempting to raise an insurrection against Ptolemy Philopator.

Cleopatra (klē'-ō-pā'-trȧ), queen of Egypt, born in 69 B. C.; celebrated for her beauty; was the daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, by whose will she was left joint sovereign with her brother Ptolemy, 51 B. C. Expelled by the latter, she sought the assistance of Julius Cæsar, who restored her to the throne in conjunction with a younger brother. She afterward followed Cæsar to Rome, and in 41 captivated Mark Antony, who rejected Octavia for her sake. A quarrel with Octavius ensued; the fleet of Antony and Cleopatra was defeated at Actium, and they fled together to Egypt, where they both ended their lives by committing suicide in the year 30 B. C.

Cleveland, Stephen Grover, president of the United States, 1885–89, and 1893–97, was born in Caldwell, Essex county, N. J., 1837; academic education; LL. D., Princeton, 1897. Went to Buffalo, 1855, became clerk in a law office and was admitted to bar, 1859; assistant district attorney of Erie county, N. Y., 1863–66; sheriff Erie county, 1870–73; established law practice; in 1881 was elected mayor of Buffalo. His veto of extravagant appropriations directed outside attention to him and led to his nomination and election as governor the following year; in 1884 was elected president of United States as democrat, over James G. Blaine, republican, by majority of thirty-seven electoral votes; in 1888 again democratic nominee, but defeated by Benjamin Harrison; returned to law practice, locating in New York; in 1892 again elected president as democrat, defeating President Harrison; in 1896, the democratic party having declared for the free coinage of silver in the platform of its national convention, Cleveland withheld his support from the ticket and platform. He took up his residence, after his second retirement from the White House, at Princeton, N. J., where he died, 1908.

Clews, Henry, banker; born in Staffordshire, England; intended for the ministry, but left school at fifteen to enter mercantile life in New York, whither his father had taken him for a visit; junior clerkship of Wilson G. Hunt & Company, woolen importers; member, firm Stout, Clews & Mason, 1858; later, Livermore, Clews & Company; at outbreak of the civil war invited by secretary of treasury to become agent to sell government bonds; firm of Henry Clews & Company organized, 1877, its members pledging themselves never to take any speculative risk. Many years treasurer American geographical society; treasurer of the society for the prevention of cruelty to animals; connected with many city institutions and financial corporations; frequent contributor to newspapers and magazines. Author: Twenty-eight Years in Wall Street, The Wall Street Point of View.

Clifford, William Kingdon, English mathematician and philosopher, was born in 1845; was educated at Cambridge; appointed professor of applied mathematics at University college, London, in 1871; wrote Seeing and Thinking, Lectures and Essays, Common Sense of the Exact Sciences, and other scientific works. Died, 1879.

Clifford, Mrs. W. K. (Lucy Lane), daughter of John Lane; married 1875, W. K. Clifford, F. R. S. Author: Mrs. Keith's Crime; Love Letters of a Worldly Woman; Mere Stories; A Woman Alone; Woodside Farm; The Getting Well of Dorothy, A Story for Children; The Modern Way; etc. Plays: The Likeness of the Night; A Long Duel, a comedy in four acts; A Supreme Moment, one act play; The Searchlight, one act; Hamilton's Second Marriage, four acts; The Latch, one act.

Clinton, De Witt, American statesman, was born at Little Britain, N. Y., 1769. He graduated at Columbia college, and after studying law entered the lower house of the New York legislature, in 1797, where he soon became the leader of his party in the state. He was chosen United States senator in 1802, but left the senate to become mayor of New York city. On the question of war with England, he competed for the presidency with Madison, receiving eighty-nine votes. He was elected governor of New York four times. His greatest service to the state was in urging the construction of the Erie canal, and pushing the measure assiduously until he saw that great enterprise completed and the canal open for traffic. He died at Albany, N. Y., 1828.

Clinton, George, American commander and statesman, born in 1739. He served in early life under General Amherst against the French, and afterward studied the law. During the struggle for independence he sat in the colonial congress, and was made a brigadier-general. With an inferior force, he succeeded in preventing Sir Henry Clinton from assisting General Burgoyne. Died, 1812.

Clinton, Sir Henry, an English general, was born about 1738; entered the British army 1751, and succeeded Sir William Howe as commander-in-chief in America; fought at Bunker Hill and Long Island, and captured Charleston. His course was marked by bravery and good conduct, but not with success. After his return to England he was appointed governor of Limerick, and subsequently of Gibraltar, where he died in 1795.

Clive (klīv), Kitty, British actress, was born in London in 1711, the daughter of William Raftor, a Jacobite lawyer from Kilkenny. She came out at Drury Lane about 1728, and continued to play chiefly at that theater till 1769, when she quitted the stage, and retired to Twickenham. About 1731 she married George Clive, a barrister, but they soon parted. She died at Little Strawberry Hill, 1785. Garrick, Handel, Horace Walpole, and Dr. Johnson all liked her, the last remarking to Boswell that "in the sprightliness of humor he never had seen her equaled."

Clive, Robert, Lord, English statesman and soldier, was born at Styche, near Market Drayton, in Shropshire, 1725; died in London, 1774. He went to India in 1744 as a writer under the East India company, but three years later relinquished the civil for the military service, in which he greatly distinguished himself. Returning to England in 1753, he went back to India as governor of Fort St. David, near Madras, and with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. Scarcely had he arrived when the nabob of Bengal captured Calcutta, destroyed the British factories near that city, and threw 146 of his prisoners into the memorable "black hole of Calcutta," from which only twenty-three came out alive. The victory of Plassey, 1757, was Clive's retaliation for these wrongs. He was now made governor of Bengal, but two years afterward returned once more to England, when he was created an Irish peer. In 1765 he went again to Bengal, as president, but finally returned to England in 1767. His last years were embittered by the attacks of his enemies, and by charges of malversation and abuse of power; but the house of commons rejected a motion against him, and declared that "he had rendered great and meritorious services to his country." In a fit of gloom, however, probably induced by disease, he put an end to his life by suicide.

Clodd (klŏd), Edward, English scientist and writer, secretary, London joint-stock bank, ltd., since 1872; born in Margate, 1840. Educated at Aldeburgh grammar school. Entered commercial life, 1855; clerk in London joint-stock bank, ltd., 1862. Author: The Childhood of the World; The Childhood of Religions; Jesus of Nazareth; Myths and Dreams; Story of Creation; Story of Primitive Man; Primer of Evolution; Story of the Alphabet; Thomas Henry Huxley; Animism: or the Seed of Religion; articles in Encyclopædia Britannica, Chambers's Clycopædia, Quarterly Review, etc.

Clodius (klō'-dĭ-ŭs), Publius, a famous Roman tribune who committed sacrilege and was tried for the offense, but acquitted through bribery. He persecuted Cicero, who had become his enemy by testifying against him, and was killed in an encounter with Milo, 52 B. C.

Clough (klŭf), Arthur Hugh, English poet, was born at Liverpool, 1819. His father, a cotton merchant, of an old Denbighshire family, in the winter of 1822-23 emigrated to Charleston, South Carolina, and there the boy lived until in 1828 he was taken back to school at Chester, and next year at Rugby, then under Dr. Arnold. In 1837 he entered Balliol college, Oxford; in 1842 he was elected a fellow of Oriel. For a time he fell under the spell of Newman's influence, but this was soon followed by a period of severe inward struggle, with the result that he felt it his duty to withdraw in 1848 from Oriel. The same year he published the Bothie of Toberna-Vuolich, a "long vacation pastoral" in hexameter verse. He traveled in France and Italy, part of the time with Emerson, and was appointed on his return in 1849 warden of University hall, London. In 1852 he visited America. Died at Florence, Italy, 1861.

Clovis I. (klŏ'-vĭs), son of Childeric I., was born about 465, and is regarded as the real founder of the French monarchy. He succeeded Childeric in 481. The victory of Soissons, which he gained in 486 over Syagrius, rendered him master of all the Roman possessions in the center of Gaul. Victorious when opposed to the Germans at Tolbiac near Cologne, in 496, he is said to have made a vow embracing Christianity, and to have kept his promise. He was baptized by St. Remigius, archbishop of Rheims. Having conquered Alaric, king of the Visigoths, in 507, he gained most of the south provinces, but was himself overthrown near Arles, by Theodoric, in 509. Died, 511.

Cobb, Henry Ives, architect; born at Brookline, Mass., 1859; educated at private and public schools and at Massachusetts institute of technology; graduated from Harvard, 1880. He entered an architect's office in Boston, and in 1881 removed to Chicago; established practice, and was architect for Chicago opera house, Newberry library, university of Chicago, church of the Atonement, and many prominent residence, business and public buildings in Chicago and other cities; one of national board of architects of World's Columbian exposition, 1893; special architect for United States government, 1893–1903; also large general practice throughout the country — including the Pennsylvania state capitol, United States government buildings at Chicago, League island, Annapolis, etc., and the American university at Washington, and many other prominent buildings.

Cobbe (kŏb), Frances Power, British author, was born at Newbridge near Dublin, 1822, and went to school at Brighton. Her interest was early aroused in theological questions; and her mother's death led her to Theodore Parker, whose counsels are contained in his famous Sermon of the Immortal Life. Her father, too, died in 1857, when, leaving Newbridge, she traveled in Italy and the East, and wrote Cities of the Past, and Italics. A strong theist, a supporter of women's rights, and a prominent antivivisectionist, she published more than thirty works, among them Friendless Girls; Criminals, Idiots, Women, and Minors; Darwinism in Morals; The Hopes of the Human Race Hereafter and Here; Re-echoes; The Peak in Darien; Scientific Spirit of the Age; and an autobiography. Died, 1904.

Cobbett (kŏb'-ĕt), William, British politician and miscellaneous writer, born at Farnham, Surrey, 1762; commenced life as a farm laborer, and then as copying clerk; enlisted, and saw seven years' service in Nova Scotia; being discharged, traveled in France and America; on his return started the Weekly Political Register, at first tory, then radical; published a libel against the government, for which he was imprisoned; on his release issued his Register at a low price, to the immense increase of its circulation; vain attempts were made to crush him, against which he never ceased to protest; after the passing of the reform bill he was elected to parliament, and proved an effective debater. His writings were numerous, and include his Grammar, Cottage Economy, Rural Rides, and Advice to Young Men and Women; his political opinions were extreme, but his English was admirable. Died, 1835.

Cochrane (kŏk′-ran), Thomas (tenth earl of Dundonald). See Dundonald.

Cockburn (kō′-burn), Sir Alexander, British jurist, was born in 1802; in 1822 entered Trinity hall, Cambridge; in 1829 was admitted to the bar, and soon became distinguished as a pleader before parliamentary committees. In 1847 he became liberal member of parliament for Southampton, in 1850 a knight and solicitor-general, in 1851 attorney-general, in 1856 chief justice of the common pleas, in 1858 a baronet, and in 1859 lord chief justice. He prosecuted in the Palmer case, and presided over the Wainwright and Tichborne cases. He represented Britain in the Alabama claims at Geneva. He died, 1880.

Cockburn, Sir George, English naval officer, whose operations against Martinique secured that island to Great Britain, was born in 1772. He was active in the war with the United States in 1812–15, marauding along the shores of the Chesapeake and burning the public buildings at Washington. His last noteworthy sea employment was to convey Napoleon to St. Helena. He rose to rank of admiral, was several times returned to house of commons, and was one of the lords of the admiralty. Died, 1853.

Cockran, William Bourke, lawyer, orator; born in Ireland, 1854; educated in Ireland and France; came to the United States, 1871; taught in private academy; later, principal of a public school in Westchester county, N. Y.; then a lawyer, soon becoming prominent in New York city politics; made noteworthy speeches at national democratic conventions, 1884 and 1892, opposing the nomination of Cleveland; member of congress, 1887–89, and 1891–95, as democrat. In 1896, became advocate of the gold standard and campaigned for McKinley. On issue of anti-imperialism, returned to democratic party, 1900, and campaigned for Bryan. Was again elected to congress, February 23, 1904, at a special election to fill a vacancy caused by the resignation of George B. McClellan; reëlected, 1904 and 1906.

Cockrell, Francis Marion, ex-United States senator, lawyer; was born in Johnson county, Mo., 1834; graduated from Chapel Hill college, Missouri, 1853; studied law, and admitted to bar, 1855; practiced at Warrensburg; served in Confederate States army, captain to brigadier-general. Resumed practice after war; United States senator, 1875–1905; was chairman senate committee on engrossed bills and member committees on appropriations, military affairs, rules, etc., and select committee on industrial expositions; member of the interstate commerce commission, 1905-10.

Coghlan, Rose, actress; born at Peterboro, England, 1853; played soubrette parts at Theater Royal, Cheltenham, England, later becoming leading lady; went to London and traveled through the provinces in burlesque and comedy. Came to the United States, 1872, with Lydia Thompson, soon after joining E. A. Sothern; returned to England and supported Barry Sullivan; leading lady with Wallack, 1880–89. Has starred since then in various companies in the United States and England; naturalized American citizen, 1902, and engaged in stock raising in Montana.

Coke (kŏŏk or kōk), Sir Edward, English jurist and law writer, was born 1552; educated at Norwich grammar school and Cambridge; admitted to the bar in 1578; early acquired a high reputation, and became solicitor-general in 1592, and attorney-general in 1594. He showed much harshness in his prosecution of Essex, Raleigh, and others; but his loyalty gained him the chief-justiceship of the common pleas, in 1606. In this position and that of chief-justice of the king's bench, 1613, he opposed James I.'s claim to exercise prerogatives and was temporarily deprived in 1616. Entering parliament in 1621, he there resisted the king's encroachments; was imprisoned in the Tower in 1622, and in 1628 took the chief part in drawing up the petition of right. The remainder of his life was spent in compiling his Commentaries upon Littleton. Died, 1634.

Colbert (kōl′-bâr′), Jean Baptiste, a distinguished French statesman, minister of finance in the reign of Louis XIV.; was born at Rheims, France, 1619. His whole life was devoted to financial and fiscal reforms, and to the encouragement of commerce and manufactures. To him the kingdom was indebted for the enlargement of its navy, for the acquisition of many of its foreign possessions, and for a large number of internal improvements. He instituted the royal academy of painting and sculpture, and also the academies of science and of architecture. The gardens of the Tuileries, the Hôtel des Invalides, the façade of the Louvre, and several of the quays along the Seine were all the work of Colbert. Died, 1683.

Cole, Thomas, artist, was born at Bolton, England, 1801, and came to America in 1819, where he became one of the best known landscape painters. In 1830 two of his pictures appeared in the royal academy, and he afterward made sketching tours through England, France, and Italy; but all his best landscapes were American. Died at Catskill, N. Y., 1848.

Cole, Timothy, wood engraver, was born at London, England, 1852, and came to the United States, 1857; burned out by Chicago fire of 1871; returned to New York penniless; entered employment of Scribner's Magazine, 1875. Went to Europe to engrave the old masters, 1883; finished first Italian series, 1892, Dutch and Flemish series, 1896, English series, 1900, Spanish series, 1907; French series, 1910. Received diploma, Chicago exposition, 1893; first-class gold medal, Paris exposition, 1900; grand prix, St. Louis exposition, 1904. Honorary member society of sculptors, painters, and engravers, London. Author: Notes to Old Italian Masters; Monograph on the lives of Dutch Masters; Notes to English Masters.

Colebrooke (kōl'-brŏŏk or kŏŏl'-brŏŏk), Henry Thomas, British orientalist, was born in London, 1765. He was a director of the Bengal Asiatic society, and made translations from the Sanskrit works on Hindu law, algebra, arithmetic, and mensuration, which were important contributions to the history of mathematics. He laid the foundations for the modern study of Sanskrit. Died, 1837.

Colenso (kō-lĕn'-sō), John William, English divine, was born in 1814. In 1846 he was appointed rector of Forncett St. Mary, in the county of Norfolk, England, and 1853 first bishop of Natal, South Africa. In the next year appeared his Ten Weeks in Natal; in 1861 his Translation of the Epistle to the Romans Commented on from a Missionary Point of View; A Letter to his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury upon the Question of the Proper Treatment of Cases of Polygamy, as found already existing in Converts from Heathenism; and in 1862 The Pentateuch and Book of Joshua Critically Examined. The two latter subjected him to intense criticism, and the bishop of Cape Town declared him deposed from his see; but on an appeal to the privy council, in 1865, the deposition was pronounced null and void. Colenso wrote treatises on mathematics used as text books. Died, 1883.

Coler, Bird Sim, politician, financier, ex-comptroller of New York; born at Champaign, Ill., 1867; educated at polytechnic institute and Andover academy. Entered his father's banking house as clerk and later became partner of the firm of W. N. Coler & Co. Candidate for alderman at large, Brooklyn, 1892; democratic candidate for governor of New York, 1902; elected comptroller city of New York, 1897; president borough of Brooklyn, 1906-09, on the municipal ownership ticket; delegate to democratic national convention, 1896. Author: Municipal Government, as illustrated by the Charter, Finances and Public Charities of New York; The Financial Effects of Consolidation, Municipal Government and Tunnels and Bridges.

Coleridge (kōl'-rĭj), Hartley, eldest son of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, born at Clevedon, near Bristol, 1796. In 1815 he was entered a scholar of Merton college, Oxford. He then went to London, wrote for the London Magazine, and published therein some sonnets of remarkable beauty. He afterward attempted a private school at Ambleside, but failed. Near this little town he resided till he died, 1849.

Coleridge, Samuel Taylor, British poet, essayist, and dramatist, was born in Devonshire in 1772. He was sent to Christ's hospital, and subsequently studied at Cambridge, where, in 1792, he obtained the prize for the best Greek ode. His works are many, and are generally distinguished by benevolence and piety. His Sibylline Leaves and Biographia Literaria found many admirers, and several of his poems have been given very high praise, particularly the Ancient Mariner. Among his other works are: Remorse, a Tragedy, Christabel, Aids to Reflection, etc. Died, 1834.

Colfax (kōl'-făks), Schuyler, American statesman, vice-president of the United States, 1869–73, was born in New York, 1823. Removing to Indiana, he published a newspaper at South Bend, which he made the foremost whig journal in the state. Elected to congress by the newly formed republican party, in 1854, he remained a member until 1869 and was three times speaker. He was elected vice-president on the ticket with Grant, in 1868. He died 1885.

Coligny (kō'-lēn'-yē' or kō-lēn'-yē), Gaspard de Chatillon, Sire de, French admiral and general of eminence, born at Châtillon-sur-Loing, 1517. Introduced at court, he served under Francis I. in Italy. Under Henry II. he was made an infantry colonel, and in 1552 admiral of France. On the death of Henry II. Coligny became a Protestant, and a friend of the prince of Condé. Coligny went to court, and was apparently well received by Charles IX., but the enmity of the Guises, by whom Coligny was unjustly accused of murdering the duke of Guise at the siege of Orleans, was stirred up against him, and an attempt was made by one of their menials to assassinate him, 1572. This attempt at individual murder was but a preliminary step to the general massacre of the Huguenots, which took place two days afterward, and in which Coligny was basely slaughtered, his body being afterward exposed to the vile outrages of the mob. In 1889 a statue of Coligny of colossal size was unveiled in Paris.

Collier (kŏl'-yẽr), Jeremy, English clergyman and controversialist, was born at Stow cum Quy, Cambridgeshire, 1650. He was educated at Caius college, Cambridge, afterward becoming rector of Ampton near Bury St. Edmunds, and lecturer at Gray's Inn. His reply to Burnet's Inquiry into the State of Affairs, 1688, cost him some months in Newgate. He next waged warfare on the crown with incisive pamphlets, and was arrested in 1692 on suspicion of being involved in a Jacobite plot. In 1697 he published his Short View of the Immorality of the English Stage, which fell like a thunderbolt among the wits. Collier continued to preach, and was consecrated bishop in 1713. He died, 1726. His largest works were the Great Historical, Geographical, Genealogical, and Poetical Dictionary, and An Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain.

Collier, Peter Fenelon, publisher, was born at Carlow, Ireland, 1849; educated at Mt. St. Mary's college, Cincinnati. Founder and publisher of Collier's Weekly and head of P. F. Collier & Son, publishers. Member of Ohio society, American academy of political and social science, United States Catholic historical society, New York historical association, and of many clubs and turf associations. Died, 1909.

Collingwood, Cuthbert, Lord, English admiral, was born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1750. He entered the navy at eleven, and from 1778 his career was closely connected with that of Nelson, whom he followed up the ladder of promotion step by step. Among the great naval victories in which he bore a prominent part were those of Lord Howe off Brest in 1794; of Lord Jervis off Cape St. Vincent in 1797; and of Trafalgar in 1805, where he held the second command. A peerage was his reward. After several years' uneventful service in the Mediterranean, he died at sea, 1810, and was buried beside Nelson, in St. Paul's.

Collins, William, English artist, was born in Great Tichfield street, London, 1788. In 1807 he entered the royal academy as a student, and in the same year he exhibited two pictures at the academy's exhibition. At first, necessity obliged him to devote himself to portraits, but he latterly devoted himself successfully to landscapes and genre pictures. He was elected R. A. in 1820. In 1836 he visited Italy, and remained there nearly two years, studying the great masters, and sketching monks and peasants, and groups of bronzed children. In 1839 he sent to the academy several Italian pictures, which were greatly admired. His attempts in another direction — "Our Saviour with the Doctors in the Temple," and "The Two Disciples at Emmaus" — were not particularly successful, and he fell back on his green fields, his sea-beaches, his rustics, and his children at their games. Died at London, 1847.

Collins, William Wilkie, English novelist, was born in London, 1824. He was educated at a private school. After a short time spent with a firm in the tea trade he adopted the profession of the law, and was a student at Lincoln's Inn. From 1848 he made literature his profession. His first novel was printed in 1850, and was called Antonina, or The Fall of Rome. This was followed by Basil, a story of modern life; Mr. Wray's Cash Box; Hide and Seek; After Dark; The Dead Secret; The Woman in White; No Name; Armadale; The Moonstone; Man and Wife; The New Magdalen; The Law and the Lady; etc. His principal books have been translated into French, Italian, German, Dutch, Danish, and Russian. Died, 1889.

Collyer (kŏl'-yẽr), Robert, Unitarian clergyman; born Keighly, Yorkshire, England, 1823; learned the blacksmith trade, which he followed after coming to the United States, 1850. Was Methodist local preacher, but became a Unitarian in 1859; became Unitarian missionary in Chicago; founded and was pastor of Unity church there, 1860–79; in 1879 became pastor of church of the Messiah, New York (later pastor emeritus). Author: Nature and Life; The Life That Now Is; The Simple Truth: a Home Book; Talks to Young Men; History of Ilkley in Yorkshire (with Horsefall Turner); Things New and Old. Died, 1912.

Colman, George, commonly called "the elder," English dramatic author and theatrical manager, was born at Florence in 1732. In 1760 his first dramatic piece, entitled Polly Honeycomb, was produced at Drury Lane, London, with great success. Next year he gave to the world his comedy of The Jealous Wife, and in conjunction with Garrick in 1766 wrote The Clandestine Marriage. In 1767 he became part owner of Covent Garden theater, and held the office of acting manager for seven years. In 1777 he purchased the Haymarket. He died, 1794. Colman was an industrious author; besides poetry and translations, he wrote and adapted upward of thirty dramatic pieces.

Colman, George, "the younger," son of the preceding, was born in 1762. His bent lay in the same direction as his father's, during whose illness he acted as manager of the Haymarket theater; and on the death of the elder Colman, George III. transferred the patent to his son. Colman held for a considerable time the office of examiner of plays. In industry, he rivaled his father, and he received large sums for his dramatic writings. His best known plays are The Poor Gentleman, John Bull, and The Heir at Law. He died, 1836.

Colman, Samuel, American painter, was born in Portland, Maine, 1832; studied in Europe in 1860–62; was elected a member of the national academy in 1862, and first president (1866–67) of the American society of painters in water colors. His pictures include scenes from Algeria, Germany, France, Italy, and Holland.

Colonna (kō-lŏn'-nä), Vittoria, the most celebrated poetess of Italy, was the daughter of Fabrizio Colonna, high constable of Naples, at whose estate of Marino she was born in the year 1490. When four years old she was betrothed to a boy of the same age, Fernando d'Avalos, son of the Marchese de Pescara. At seventeen they were married. After her husband's death in the battle of Pavia, 1525, she found her chief consolation in solitude and in the cultivation of her poetical genius. Her friendship with Michaelangelo is well known. He addressed many of his sonnets to her. Died in Rome, 1547.

Colquhoun (kō-hōōn'), Archibald Ross, journalist, descriptive writer, born off cape of Good Hope, 1848, of Scotch parentage. Educated in Scotland and on the continent. Indian public works department, 1871; secretary and second in command of government mission to Siam and Siamese Shan states, 1879; explored from Canton to Bhamo to trace best route for connecting Burmah and China by railway, 1881-82; London Times correspondent Franco-Chinese war and whole far East, 1883-84; proposed annexation of upper Burmah, and visited Siam in connection with railway construction, 1885; deputy-commissioner of upper Burmah, 1885–89; accompanied pioneer force to South Africa, and on occupation of Mashonaland became administrator, 1890; executed Manika treaty; has traveled extensively, and been Times correspondent in various parts of world. Author: The Key of the Pacific; China in Transformation; Russia Against India; The Renascence of South Africa; The Mastery of the Pacific; Greater America; The Africander Land; The Whirlpool of Europe; Austria-Hungary and the Habsburgs (with Mrs. Colquhoun); From Dan to Beersheba — reminiscences of public service; and many contributions to the periodical press.

Colt, Samuel, American inventor, born in Hartford, Conn., 1814. He early conceived the idea of revolving fire-arms, and, in 1835, took out a patent for the weapon since known the world over as "Colt's revolver." In 1848 he established a company for the working out of his patent, and built at Hartford one of the most extensive armories in the world. Died, 1862.

Columba (kō-lŭm'-bȧ), St., Celtic missionary, was born at Gartan, County Donegal, 521, the son of a chief related to several of the princes then reigning in Ireland and in the west of Scotland. He studied under St. Finnian at Moville on Strangford Lough and under another St. Finnian at Clonard; in 546 he founded the monastery of Derry, and in 553 that of Durrow. Accompanied by twelve disciples, he founded a monastery at Iona, Scotland, 563, and set himself to convert the northern Picts; he and his followers founded monasteries on the Pictish mainland, the Western islands, and the Orkneys. The parent house of Iona exercised supremacy over all these, as well as over the Columban churches in Ireland and those afterward established in the north of England. He died, 597.

Columbus, Christopher. See page 329.

Columella, Lucius Junius Moderatus, the most learned of Roman writers on practical agriculture, born at Cadiz in Spain, and flourished in the earlier part of the first century of the Christian era. For some time he resided in Syria, but lived chiefly at Rome, and died, most probably, at Tarentum. His great work, De Re Rustica, in twelve books, is addressed to one Publius Silvinus, and treats of arable and pasture land, culture of vines, olives, etc., the respective duties of masters and servants, etc.

Combe (kōōm or kōm), George, British phrenologist and moral philosopher, born in Edinburgh, 1788. As early as 1816 he made the acquaintance of Dr. Spurzheim, while the latter was on a visit to Scotland, but at first regarded his phrenological system with aversion. Investigation, however, convinced him that phrenology was based on fact. The result was his Essays on Phrenology, 1819. Five years later appeared his System of Phrenology. But his most important production is The Constitution of Man Considered in Relation to External Objects. Died, 1858.

Comenius (kō-mā'-nē-ŏŏs or kō-mē'-nĭ-ŭs), or Komenski, John Amos, educational reformer, was born in 1592, in Moravia, either at Comna or at Nivnitz. His parents belonged to the Moravian brethren. He studied at Herborn and then at Heidelberg, became rector of the Moravian school of Prerau, 1614–16, and minister at Fulnek, but lost all his property and library in 1621, when that town was taken by the imperialists. Settling at Lissa in Poland, 1628, he here worked out his new theory of education, wrote his Didactica Magna, and was chosen bishop of the Moravian brethren in 1632. In 1631 he published his Janua Linguarum Reserata, and in 1639 his Pansophiæ Prodromus. In 1641 he was invited to England by parliament to assist in reforming the system of public instruction; but owing to the outbreak of the civil war, he went instead to Sweden, 1642. He returned to Lissa in 1648, and in 1650 went to Saros-Patak, Hungary. Here he composed his Orbis Sensualium Pictus, the first picture book for children. Finally, he settled in Amsterdam, and died at Naarden, 1671.

S., Cornell, 1874; instructor entomology, 1875-77, assistant professor, 1877-78, Cornell; United States entomologist at Washington, 1879-81. Author: A Manual for the Study of Insects; Insect Life; Notes on Entomology; Report on Cotton Insects; Introduction to Entomology; How to Know the Butterflies (with his wife). Contributor of papers on entomology in various scientific journals.

Comte (kôɴt), Auguste, French philosopher, founder of the "positive philosophy," born at Montpellier, France, 1798. He studied at Paris, and attracted the attention of his companions by the boldness and novelty of his speculations, maintaining that the time was come when philosophy must undergo another great change, such as it had done in the days of Bacon. He became acquainted with St. Simon, and in 1820 was appointed to prepare an exposition of the Politique Positive of the St. Simonian society. In 1832 was appointed professor of mathematics at the École Polytechnique, which situation he was forced to resign in 1852, on account of differences with his colleagues. Died, 1857.

Conant (kō'-nant), Charles Arthur, author, banker; born at Winchester, Mass., 1861; educated at grammar and high schools, supplemented by private study. Long identified with educational and social movements; founded, and edited four years, Catholic School and Home Magazine. Author: Bible Studies, for use in colleges and schools.

Condé (kôɴ'-dā'), Prince de, Louis I. de Bourbon, younger brother of Antony of Bourbon, king of Navarre, was born 1530. During the wars between Henry II. and Spain, he distinguished himself at the siege of Metz, the battle of St. Quentin, and the capture of Calais from the English. On Francis II.'s accession, 1559, Condé, like his brother, joined the Huguenots, took part in the unlucky conspiracy of Amboise against the Guises, and escaped execution only by the death of the king. The regent, Catharine de' Medicis, the Guises' bitter enemy, made concessions to the Huguenots, and Condé became governor of Picardy. The massacre of Huguenots at Vassy by Guise, 1562, led to the first civil war, and Condé and Coligny gathered a Huguenot army; but at Dreux Condé was defeated and taken prisoner. In the second Huguenot war, 1567–69, Condé had coins struck with the inscription: "Louis XIII., first Christian king of France"; but at Jarnac, 1569, he was defeated, taken prisoner, and shot.

Condé, Prince de, Louis II. de Bourbon, commonly termed "the great Condé," was born 1621. By the death of his father, 1646, he became head of his family, and, next to the duke of Orleans, the highest personage in the state. At the head of troops collected in the Netherlands, he gained the battle of Bleneau, in April, 1652, and immediately marched upon Paris. After a fruitless effort to seize Paris he left the country, and on the formal outbreak of war between France and Spain became generalissimo of the Spanish forces, but was unable to gain the advantage over Turenne. The war having been renewed by Spain, 1673, he again commanded the French in the Netherlands, and soon after retired to Chantilly, where he enjoyed the society of such men as Molière, Boileau, and La Bruyère. Died, 1686.

Condillac (kôɴ′-dē′-yȧk′), Étienne Bonnot de Mably de, French philosopher, the founder of sensationalism, was born of a noble family at Grenoble, 1715. As a child his delicate health delayed his progress in education; but in youth he numbered among his friends Rousseau, Diderot, Duclos, etc. Many of his works were composed for his pupil, the duke of Parma, grandson of Louis XIV.; and he was titular Abbé de Mureaux. He was chosen a member of the French academy of sciences in 1768. He died on his estate of Flux, near Beaugency, in 1780. He based all knowledge on the senses. Among his works were Essai sur l'Origine des Connaissances Humaines; Traité des Systèmes; Traité des Sensations; Logique; and Langue des Calculs.

Condorcet (kôɴ′-dōr′-sĕ′), Jean Marie Antoine Nicholas Caritat, Marquis de, French philosopher and mathematician, was born in 1743. He first gained celebrity by his successful labors as a mathematician. His treatise on integral calculus, written when he was but twenty-two years of age, was eminently successful, and was considered to indicate a degree of knowledge seldom possessed at so early an age. He was the friend of D'Alembert and of almost all his illustrious contemporaries, as well as one of the disciples of Voltaire. Being appointed governor of the dauphin by the constituent assembly, he was successively called to the legislative body and to the convention; but subsequently denounced as a partisan of the Girondists, he was outlawed in 1793, and shortly after was taken prisoner, when he poisoned himself, in 1794.

Confucius (kŏn-fū′-shĭ-ŭs), (Chinese philosopher). See page 198.

Congreve (kŏng′-grēv), William, English dramatist, was born near Leeds, 1670. He entered himself as a student at the Middle Temple, but abandoned the law for literature. His first piece, written at the age of seventeen, was a romance entitled Incognita, or Love and Duty Reconciled. In 1693 he wrote his first comedy, The Old Bachelor. This brought him not only great reputation, but also the substantial benefit of a commissionership in the hackney-coach office, which was given to him by the earl of Halifax, who afterward still further patronized and favored him. He wrote also Love for Love; The Double Dealer; The Mourning Bride; The Way of the World; an opera, and some poems. Died, 1729.

Conkling (kŏngk′-lĭng), Roscoe, American politician, was born at Albany, N. Y., 1829. In 1846 he removed to Utica, N. Y., where he became district attorney, and was mayor in 1858. In the latter year he was elected to congress, and in 1867 became a member of the United States senate. He took an active and prominent part in the practical business of both houses, served on important committees, and was instrumental in the passing of many useful legislative measures. After the war he took an active part in the reconstruction of the southern states, and advocated the resumption of specie payments. He opposed President Johnson's policy, and was a zealous champion of Grant's administration. In 1881 he resigned his seat in the senate, owing to Garfield's assumption of the control over appointments in his native state. In 1882 he was appointed associate-justice of the supreme court, but declined the appointment. Died at New York, 1888.

Connaught, Arthur William Patrick Albert, duke of, third son of Queen Victoria, was born May 1, 1850. He was educated at Woolwich; entered the army, 1868; became captain, 1871, major, 1875, colonel and major-general, 1880; accompanied the expedition to Egypt, 1882; became lieutenant-general, 1889, and general, 1893. He commanded the Bombay army in India, 1886–90, the southern district of England, 1890–93, that of Aldershot, 1893–98. In 1900 he succeeded Lord Roberts in command of the forces in Ireland; became inspector-general in 1904, and was commander-in-chief of Mediterranean, 1907–09. He was created duke of Connaught and Strathearn and earl of Sussex in 1874; married Princess Louise of Prussia, 1879. In 1911 he was designated by George V. to succeed Earl Grey as governor-general of Canada.

"Connor, Ralph." See Gordon, Charles W.

Conrad I. (kŏn′-răd), was chosen king of Germany in 911, and was the first of the elected rulers of Germany. His short reign was spent in putting down his nobles, who were always rebelling against him, Duke Henry of Saxony being the one who gave him most trouble. Many contests took place with him, and Henry showed so much ability that even Conrad admired him; and when he was mortally wounded in a battle with the Huns, Conrad begged his nobles to elect the duke of Saxony to succeed him, as Henry I., which they did. Conrad died, 918.

Conrad III., the first Hohenstaufen king of the Germans, was born 1093, son of Frederick of Swabia. He unsuccessfully contested the crown of Italy with the emperor Lothair of Saxony, on whose death the princes of Germany, fearing the growing preponderance of the Guelph party, offered Conrad the throne, and he was crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle, 1138. He was immediately involved in a quarrel with Henry the Proud, duke of Bavaria and Saxony, and head of the Guelphs in Germany; and the struggle was continued under Henry's son, Henry the Lion. When St. Bernard of Clairvaux preached a new crusade, Conrad set out for Palestine with a large army, 1147. A new attempt by the duke of Bavaria to regain his dukedom was defeated by the nephew of Conrad, whose health had broken during the crusade, and who died at Bamberg, 1152.

Conscience (kôɴ′-syäɴs′), Hendrik, Flemish novelist, was born at Antwerp, 1812, and died at Brussels, 1883. His Phantazy, a fine collection of tales, and his most popular romance, De Leeuw van Vlaenderen, early made his name known; but it was his series of charming pictures of quiet Flemish life, beginning with Hoe men schilder wordt, 1843, that, through translations, carried his name over the world.

Considérant (kôɴ'-sē̆'-dā'-räɴ'), Victor-Prosper, French socialist, was born at Salins, France, 1808; he entered the army, which, however, he soon left to promulgate Fourier's doctrines. On the death of his master, Considérant became head of his school, and edited the Phalange. An Englishman, Mr. Young, having advanced money, Considérant established a socialist colony or phalanstère in Eure-et-Loir; but the experiment failed, and with it the Phalange. Of his numerous writings the chief is the Destinée Sociale. In 1849 he was accused of high treason, and fled from France. In Texas he founded a community, La Réunion, which flourished for a time. He returned to France in 1869, and died 1893.

Constable (kŭn'-stȧ-b'l), John, landscape painter, born in East Bergholt, Suffolk, England, 1776, died suddenly 1837. He studied at the royal academy; began with portraits and historical subjects, but finally fixed upon landscape. The national gallery has his best pictures, "The Cornfield," "The Valley Farm," and "The Haywain." Several good examples of his art have been added to the Louvre, and Marquand presented two fine pictures by him to the Metropolitan museum of art, New York.

Constans (kŏn'-stănz), Flavius Julius, emperor of Rome, was born about A. D. 320. He was the youngest son of Constantine the Great, on whose death, 337, he received as his share of the empire, Western Illyricum, Italy, and Africa. Three years afterward his brother Constantine II. invaded Italy, and was killed in battle near Aquileia, when Constans became master of the whole of the Western empire. He was a weak and cruel ruler, and at last Magnentius, his general in Gaul, sent some conspirators to kill him. Constans fled to Spain, but was overtaken by them and slain, A. D. 350.

Constant de Rebecque (kôɴ'-stäɴ' dē̆ rē̆-bĕk'), Henri Benjamin, author and politician, was born of French Huguenot ancestry at Lausanne, Switzerland, 1767. Educated at Oxford, Erlangen, and Edinburgh, he in 1795 settled in Paris as a publicist. He entered the tribunate in 1799, but was banished from France in 1802 for denouncing the despotic acts of Napoleon. After traveling in Germany and Italy with Madame de Staël, he settled at Göttingen. On Napoleon's fall in 1814 he returned to Paris; during the hundred days became one of Napoleon's councillors, though previously he had styled Napoleon a Genghis Khan; and after the second restoration of the Bourbons wrote and spoke in favor of constitutional freedom. He was returned to the chamber of deputies in 1819, and became the leader of the liberal opposition. He died 1830. His De la Religion (5 vols.) is a notable work. He likewise wrote a remarkable novel, Adolphe, a short story of love and disillusion.

Constantine I. (kŏn'-stan-tīn), called the Great; born in 272, at Mœsia, was the son of Constantius Chlorus by Helena. On the death of his father at York, where he accompanied him, Constantine was proclaimed emperor by the troops; this title being challenged by Maximian, his father-in-law, and Maxentius, his brother-in-law, he took up arms against first the one and then the other, and defeated them. One day he saw a cross in the sky with the words, "By this conquer," in Greek, and under this sign, known as the labarum, which he adopted as his standard, he accordingly marched straight to Rome, where he was acknowledged emperor by the senate in 312, and thereafter an edict was issued named of Milan, granting toleration to the Christians. He had still to extend his empire over the East, and having done so by the removal of Licinius, he transferred the seat of his empire to Byzantium, which was thereafter called Constantinople, i. e., Constantine's city. Constantine was baptized in 337 as a Christian, after having three years before proclaimed Christianity the state religion. Died, 337.

Constantine XIII., Palæologus, the last emperor of the East, born in 1394. His father and his brother had been emperors before him, and he did not come to the throne until he was fifty-four years old, 1448. At that time the Turks had conquered almost all of the Eastern empire, and but little was left besides Constantinople and a few other cities. The Turkish sultan, Mohammed II., determined to take Constantinople also, and laid siege to it with a great army, 1453. Constantine, who had only about 9,000 soldiers, resisted bravely for nearly two months, but at last the Turks battered down part of the walls and rushed in with wild shouts, and the emperor and his little band of nobles were all slain. Constantine's body, found under a heap of the dead, was known by the gold eagles on his shoes. It is said that Mohammed had his head cut off and exhibited it in all the cities of Arabia and Persia.

Constantius I., called Chlorus, a Roman emperor, father of Constantine the Great, born about A. D. 250. Constantius served in the army with distinction under the emperor Diocletian, and in 292, when the two emperors Diocletian and Maximian each appointed a favorite general as assistant emperor, under the title of Cæsar, Constantius received the place of Cæsar to Diocletian. After he had been Cæsar thirteen years he was made chief emperor, when Diocletian gave up the throne. He died at York, England, 306.

Constantius II., a Roman emperor, second son of Constantine the Great, born 317. Constantine on his death divided his empire among his three sons, Constantine, Constans, and Constantius, but at last the whole was united under Constantius. There were many rival emperors in his time, many disputes in the church, and many unsuccessful wars against the Germans and Persians. His cousin Julian won so many victories that the army proclaimed him emperor, and Constantius marched against him, but died on the way, 361. He was succeeded by Julian.

Converse, John H., philanthropist, manufacturer; president of Burnham, Williams & Co., proprietors of Baldwin locomotive works, Philadelphia; born at Burlington, Vt., 1840; educated at university of Vermont. Cook, Captain James, a celebrated English navigator, best known through his Voyages Round the World; born in Marton, in North Riding, Yorkshire, 1728. He made three principal voyages, in the course of which he made many important discoveries, but was ultimately killed in a quarrel with the natives of Hawaii. His kindly disposition and his scrupulous justice and humanity were, with his skill as a navigator, among his first recommendations. After his death, at Hawaii, one of the Sandwich islands, 1779, many honors were paid to his memory, both in his own and in foreign countries.

Cooke, Josiah Parsons, American chemist, was born at Boston, Mass., 1827, and was professor of chemistry at Harvard from 1850. His chief works are Elements of Chemical Physics, First Principles of Chemical Philosophy, The New Chemistry, etc. Died at Newport, R. I., 1894.

Cooke, Sir William Fothergill, British electrician, born at Ealing, England, 1806; was educated at Durham and Edinburgh, served in the Indian army from 1826 to 1831; after studying medicine at Paris and Heidelberg, took up telegraphy, and in 1837 entered into partnership with Professor Wheatstone. In 1845 they patented the single needle apparatus; in 1846 Cooke formed a company, which paid £120,000 for the partners' earlier patents. In 1867 Cooke and Wheatstone received the Albert gold medal; Cooke was knighted in 1869. He died 1879.

Cooper, Anthony Ashley. See Shaftesbury.

Cooper, Sir Astley Paston, a celebrated English surgeon, was born in Brooke, Norfolk, 1768; studied under Henry Cline, surgeon to St. Thomas's hospital, London, and was appointed demonstrator of anatomy there, 1789. In 1792 he was appointed professor of anatomy at Surgeon's hall; and in 1800, surgeon to Guy's hospital. In 1813 he received the professorship of comparative anatomy in the college of surgeons. In 1822 he was elected one of the court of examiners of the college of surgeons, and in 1827, president. In the following year he received the appointment of surgeon to the king, and in 1830 was made vice-president of the royal society. He was made a member of the French institute, and corresponding member of the royal academy of sciences, a D. C. L. of Oxford, and an LL. D. of Edinburgh. He died 1841. A colossal statue to his memory is erected in St. Paul's cathedral, London.

Cooper, James Fenimore, famous American novelist, was born in Burlington, N. J., 1789. After six years' experience of naval life, he retired from the sea in 1810, and took up his residence at Cooperstown, Otsego county, N. Y. About 1819 appeared his first work, Precaution. In 1821 followed The Spy, a tale which at once secured for him a place in the first rank of novelists; then appeared his almost unequaled sea stories, The Red Rover, Pilot, and Water-witch; his famous "Leather Stocking series" of Indian life and adventure, the Pioneers, Last of the Mohicans, Pathfinder, Deerslayer, Prairie, etc. Cooper, after passing some years in Europe, died at Cooperstown, in 1851. His works have been translated into every European language, and have exhausted numerous editions.

Cooper, Peter, American inventor, manufacturer, and philanthropist, was born in New York, 1791. His early life was laborious. His first invention was an improvement in a machine for shearing cloth. In 1828 he erected iron works in Canton, near Baltimore, and here constructed after his own designs the first locomotive engine ever made in this country, after which he took a great interest in the first ocean telegraph and in state canals. But the work of his life was the founding of an institution for the instruction of the industrial classes — the Cooper Union, New York, whose corner stone he laid in 1854. It contains a school of art for women taught in the day time, and a free school of telegraphy. Free schools of science, art, mathematics, practical engineering, etc., are open to youths of both sexes every evening, lectures are given, and a free reading room and library are open to the public at all hours. A cupola and an additional story were added to this fine building at the commencement of the year 1880. In 1876 the independent party nominated him for president of the United States, and he received nearly 100,000 votes. Cooper had a reception given in honor of his 84th birthday, at which he received the degree of LL. D. On his 90th birthday, 1881, he gave the Union an additional endowment. Died, 1883.

Cope (kōp), Edward Drinker, American naturalist, born in Philadelphia, 1840. He early achieved success as an investigator in herpetology, and in 1864 was appointed professor of natural science in Haverford college, but resigned because of poor health, 1867. His contributions to science have been valuable and voluminous; among them are Origin of the Fittest and Tertiary Vertebrates of North America. He died at Philadelphia, 1897.

Copernicus (kō-pĕr'-nĭ-kŭs), Nicholas. See page 337.

Copley (kŏp'-lĭ), John Singleton, American painter, was born at Boston, Mass., 1737. When only sixteen, his portraits were admired. Washington sat to him in 1755, and later, in London, he painted George III. and his queen. Here, also, he became the friend of such men as West and Reynolds. Some of his best works are: "Death of Lord Chatham," "Death of Major Pierson," "Charles I. Demanding the Surrender of the Five Members," and the "Assassination of Buckingham." His historical paintings are perhaps superior to those of West, and his portraits rank with those of Reynolds and Gainsborough. He died at London, 1815.

Coppée (kō'-pā'), François, French poet, was born in Paris, 1842. For three years a war-office clerk, he early gave himself to poetry, and with Le Reliquaire and Les Inimites, gained the front rank of the "Parnassiens." Later volumes of poetry were Les Humbles, Le Cahier Rouge, Olivier (his one long poem), Les Récits et les Elégies, and Contes en Vers. His earliest dramatic poem, Le Passant, owed much to Sarah Bernhardt, and was followed by Deux Douleurs; L'Abandonnée; Le Luthier de Cremone; La Guerre de Cent Ans; Madame de Maintenon; Severo Torelli; Les Jacobites; and Le Pater. Dramatic critic for some years to La Patrie, Coppée entered the academy in 1884. Died, 1908.

Coquelin (kōk'-läɴ'), Benoît Constant, French actor, born at Boulogne, 1841, was admitted to the conservatory in 1859, and having gained the second prize for comedy, made his début at the Théâtre Français, 1860. For over a quarter of a century he played here with unbroken success, both in classical pieces and in rôles created by himself, in the broader aspects of comedy standing without a rival. He appeared in 1887 in London, in 1888-89 in South America and the United States. Died, 1909.

Corbin, Henry Clark, American general; born in Clermont county, Ohio, 1842; educated at common schools and two years in private academy; studied law, 1860-61. Entered United States volunteers, second lieutenant 83d Ohio infantry, 1862, and served throughout civil war. Entered regular army as second lieutenant 17th United States infantry, 1866; and was finally made lieutenant-general in United States army, 1906; retired in same year. Served ten years on plains in Kansas, New Mexico, Arizona, and Texas; in 1877, detailed for duty at executive mansion; secretary of Sitting Bull commission. With President Garfield at the time he was shot and at his bed-side at Elberon, where he died. In recognition of his services, and the part he took in the war with Spain, congress conferred upon him rank of major-general. Commander of the Atlantic division, 1904; conducted army maneuvers, Manassas, Va., September, 1904; commander of the Philippine division, 1904; Northern division, 1906. Died, 1909.

Corbin, John, novelist, dramatic critic; born at Chicago, 1870; graduated at Harvard, 1892, A. M., 1893; Balliol college, Oxford, 1894-95. Instructor in English composition at Harvard, 1895-96; assistant editor, Harper's Magazine, 1897–1900; dramatic critic, Harper's Weekly, 1899-1900; editorial staff, Encyclopædia Britannica, 1900–02; dramatic critic, New York Times, 1902; dramatic critic, New York Sun, 1905–07; literary manager, the New theater, New York, 1908-10. Author: An American at Oxford; A New Portrait of Shakespeare; The First Loves of Perilla; The Cave Man; Which College for the Boy? and many articles and stories in the Harper publications, Scribner's, The Century, The Atlantic Monthly, The North American Review, and the Saturday Evening Post.

Corday d'Armans (kōr'-dĕ' dȧr'-mäɴ', or môɴ'), Marie Charlotte, French heroine, was born in 1768, at St. Saturnin, Normandy, of a noble Norman family; sympathized with the ideas of the French revolution but was horrified at its excesses; visited Paris in July, 1793, with the purpose, it is said, of assassinating Marat, or Robespierre; obtaining an interview with the former while in his bath, she stabbed him with a knife; was immediately apprehended and executed four days afterward. Her beauty added to the interest which her sanguinary heroism inspired.

Corelli (kō-rĕl'-ĭ), Marie, English novelist, of mingled Italian and Scotch parentage and connections, was born 1864; adopted in infancy by Charles Mackay, the well known song-writer and litterateur, and brought up during childhood in England. Afterward sent to France and educated in a convent, where she received, with other instruction, a first-class musical training. Her first book, A Romance of Two Worlds, was an instant success, and from that time she has devoted herself entirely to literature. She has never, however, abandoned her love of music, and is proficient on the piano and the mandolin. Her books include: A Romance of Two Worlds; Vendetta; Thelma; Ardath; Soul of Lilith; Barabbas; The Sorrows of Satan; Mighty Atom; The Murder of Delicia; Ziska: The Problem of a Wicked Soul; The Master Christian; Temporal Power, A Study in Supremacy; God's Good Man; Free Opinions; The Treasure of Heaven; Holy Orders. She persuaded

Edward Morris, of Chicago, to purchase Harvard House, Stratford-on-Avon (which she had restored), and to present it to Harvard university, to which it now belongs.

Corey, William Ellis, capitalist, steel manufacturer, was born in Pennsylvania, 1866. At sixteen, entered chemical laboratory of Edgar Thomson steel works; studied bookkeeping and chemistry at home; superintendent of plate mill at twenty-three; invented Carnegie reforged armor. Succeeded Charles M. Schwab, and has been president of Carnegie steel company, National steel company, and American steel hoop company; president of United States steel corporation, 1903–11.

Cormon, Fernand, French decorative and figure painter, was born in Paris, 1845. Studied under Cabanel, Fromentin, and Portaels and became one of the leading historical painters of France. Became officer of legion of honor, 1889, and member of the institute, 1898. Among his paintings are: "Cain flying before Jehovah's Curse;" a series of panels "Birth," "Death," "Marriage," "War," etc. Exhibited at St. Louis exhibition decorations for Paris museum.

Corneille (kôr′-nāl′), Pierre, creator of French tragedy, born 1606, at Rouen. He studied for the legal profession, but a love adventure, in which he became the rival of a friend, first prompted him to write verses, and Mélite, the comedy founded on this incident, was performed with success in 1629. It was quickly followed by other dramatic pieces. In 1635 appeared his Médée, a declamatory drama, written in imitation of Seneca. Cardinal Richelieu, who aspired to be the patron of the stage, kept in his pay a number of writers for whom he dictated plots, and wished to number Corneille among his retainers; but Corneille was so audacious as to alter the plan of a comedy, and thus lost the cardinal's favor. He now returned to his native place, where M. Chalon, once secretary to Marie de' Medici, suggested that he should turn his attention to tragedy. The result was The Cid, 1636, which was received with enthusiastic applause. In 1639 he composed Horace and Cinna, which were followed by a worthy successor — Polyeucte — a tragedy of Christian martyrdom. Soon afterward appeared La Mort de Pompee, and Le Menteur, the latter a comedy, the only one he ever wrote worthy of his great genius. He did not add to his fame by the few works which he produced during the next ten years. Died, 1684.

Cornelia (kŏr-nē′-lĭ-ȧ), the daughter of Scipio Africanus, was the wife of Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, who was consul, 177 B. C. By him Cornelia had twelve children, and was left, still in the prime of life, a widow. To her children she gave all her care, though only three reached maturity, but these owed to their mother the high distinction which they gained in the commonwealth. A lady, after displaying her jewels, asked to see those of Cornelia, who, producing her sons, said "These are mine." Her hand was sought by the king of Egypt. She is said to have encouraged her sons to be too ambitious, which eventually cost them their lives.

Cornelius, von (fōn kōr-nā′-lē-o͝os), Peter, German painter, was born at Düsseldorf 1783, and studied under Langer in the academy of his native town. When only nineteen years of age he painted some remarkable frescoes for the cupola of the old church of Neuss. Four years later he gave still more unmistakable proofs of a creative fancy in his illustrations of Goethe's Faust and the Nibelungen Lied. In 1811 he went to Rome. He gained a wide reputation while at Rome by two cartoons, "Joseph's Interpretation of the Dream," and "Joseph's Recognition of his Brethren." His chief works are frescoes in the Glyptothek and Ludwigskirche, in Munich. Died, 1867.

Cornell, Ezra, American philanthropist, was born 1807, at Westchester Landing, N. Y.; died 1874, at Ithaca, N. Y. He began life as a mechanic and miller at Ithaca, N. Y. He spent his business life in the extension of the telegraph service throughout the northern and western states. He was a delegate to the first republican national convention in 1856, president of the New York state agricultural society, and its representative at the International exposition at London, 1862; member of assembly 1862–63, and state senator 1864–67. In 1865 he founded Cornell university, at Ithaca, with an endowment of $500,000 to which he subsequently added nearly $400,000. He also established the Cornell library at Ithaca, at a cost of $100,000.

Corning, James Leonard, physician; born at Stamford, Conn., 1855; educated at university of Heidelberg, and university of Würzburg, Germany; M. D., Würzburg; hon. A. M., LL. D., Williams college. Specially distinguished as neurologist; discoverer of spinal anæsthesia, 1885; first to demonstrate that the action of certain medicinal substances, notably stimulants and sedatives, may be increased and prolonged while subject remains in compressed air; also first to inject liquid paraffin into the tissues and solidify it in loco. Member of many medical and scientific societies. Author: Carotid Compression; Brain Rest; Brain Exhaustion; Local Anæsthesia; Hysteria and Epilepsy; A Treatise on Headache and Neuralgia; Pain in its Neuro-Pathological and Neuro-Therapeutic Relations; and extensive contributor to medical press on neurological subjects.

Cornwall, Barry. See Proctor.

Cornwallis, Charles, Marquis, English statesman and general, was born 1738. He entered the British army 1756; entered the house of commons 1760, and the house of lords 1763. He was promoted major-general in 1776, and in that year joined Sir William Howe in command of the British forces during the American revolution. In 1780 he defeated General Gates at Camden, won the battle of Guilford court house, 1781, and surrendered to Washington at Yorktown, October 19, 1781. He was afterward governor-general and commander-in-chief in India, where he greatly distinguished himself by his victories over Tippoo Sahib; and still later, in 1798, he was lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and in 1802 plenipotentiary of Great Britain to negotiate the peace of Amiens. Appointed, in 1805, governor-general of India a second time. He died 1805 at Ghazipur, in the province of Benares, while on his way to assume the command of the troops.

Corot (kō′-rō′), Jean Baptiste Camille, French painter, pupil of Michallon and Bertin, and founder of the impressionist school; was born in Paris, 1796. He began to exhibit in 1827, but did not produce the masterpieces, "Dante and Virgil," and "Macbeth meeting the Witches," until 1859. He even surpassed these among his landscape subjects, and as a landscape painter ranks among the first in the world. Died, 1875.

Correggio (kōr-rĕd′-jō), Antonio Allegri, celebrated Italian painter, called Correggio from the place of his birth, a small town near Modena, now called Reggio; was born 1493. He was the first among the moderns who displayed that grace and general beauty and softness of effect, the combined excellences of design and color with taste and expression for which he is still unrivaled. His chiaroscuro is perfect. Almost before he had seen the great masters, he became a master in a style all his own; he was the founder, or rather his imitators for him, of what is called by some the Lombard, by others the Parma school of painting. He painted "The Assumption of the Virgin," for the cathedral church of Parma; and among his numerous productions are the "Nativity," the "Marriage of St. Catherine," the "Holy Family," etc. Died, 1534.

Cortelyou, George Bruce, ex-public official, financier, was born in the city of New York, 1862; graduated at Hempstead (L. I.) institute, state normal school, Westfield, Mass., and the law schools of the Georgetown and Columbian (George Washington) universities; LL. D., Georgetown, 1903; in 1883 was a law reporter in New York; was principal of preparatory schools in New York from 1885 to 1889; in the latter year entered the public service, and has been private secretary to various public officials, among them the post-office inspector in charge at New York, the surveyor of the port of New York, and the fourth-assistant postmaster-general; in 1895, was appointed stenographer to President Cleveland; 1896, executive clerk; 1898, assistant secretary to President McKinley; 1900, secretary to the president, and 1901, reappointed by President Roosevelt; was appointed secretary of the newly established department of commerce and labor, 1903; 1904, was elected chairman of the republican national committee, and conducted the campaign which resulted in the election of President Roosevelt. He entered the new cabinet, 1905, as postmaster-general, and 1907 was appointed secretary of the treasury. In 1909 he became president of the New York gas company.

Cortes, or Cortez (kôr'-tĕz), Fernando, a Spanish adventurer; born in Medellin in Estremadura, in 1485. He was first destined for the law; but a passion for arms carrying him to the military profession, he went early in the sixteenth century, with Valasquez, to Cuba, and subsequently obtained the command of the expedition sent against Mexico. With seven hundred men under his command, he landed at Tobasco in 1519, and immediately burned his ships, that his followers might have no hope but in victory. He advanced to Mexico, where he was at first received with friendly demonstrations; but on his seizing Montezuma, the Mexican king, whom he subsequently put to death by fire, a struggle ensued, in which many thousands of lives were lost. He eventually succeeded in putting down all opposition, and in overrunning Mexico. While effecting this he is believed to have perpetrated the most enormous cruelties. He was rewarded with the title of marquis, and a grant of land; but subsequently, on his return to Spain, he found himself very much neglected. He died near Seville, in 1547.

Corvinus, Matthias. See Matthias Corvinus.

Corwin, Thomas, lawyer and orator, was born in Bourbon county, Kentucky, 1794; removed to Ohio in early youth; was admitted to the bar, 1818, and, after serving a number of years in the Ohio legislature, was elected a member of congress in 1830; in 1840 governor of Ohio; elected to the senate of the United States in 1845, and appointed secretary of the treasury by President Fillmore in 1850. He was sent as minister to Mexico 1861, returned home in 1864, and died in Washington, D. C., 1865.

Coudert, Frederick Rene, American lawyer, was born in New York, 1832; graduated at Columbia, 1850, and was admitted to the New York bar in 1853 as a member of the legal firm of Coudert Bros. He acquired a wide reputation as a lawyer, orator, and public lecturer. Coverdale, (kŭv'-ẽr-dāl) Miles, translator of the English Bible, was born in Yorkshire, 1488; died in London, 1568. He was a monk of Norwich, but early devoted himself to the work of the reformation. In 1551 he was appointed bishop of Exeter, but was ejected and imprisoned on the accession of Mary in 1553. In the subsequent reign of Elizabeth, till within two years of his death, he was rector of the church of St. Magnus, in the city of London; and to that church his remains were removed in 1840, when the church of St. Bartholomew, in which he was at first buried, was taken down. The Psalms of Coverdale and Tyndale's translation are still used in the services of the church of England.

Cowley, Abraham, in his own day considered the greatest of English poets, was born in London, 1618. Attracted to poetry by the Faërie Queen, he wrote excellent verses at ten, and at fifteen published five poems. From Westminster school he proceeded in 1637 to Trinity college, Cambridge, and while here wrote, among many other pieces, a large portion of his epic, the Davideis, its hero King David. During the English civil war he was ejected from Cambridge, but at St. John's, Oxford, studied for another two years. In 1646 he followed Henrietta Maria to Paris, was sent on royalist missions, and carried on her correspondence in cipher with the king. He returned to England in 1656, was arrested, released on £1,000 bail, and, perhaps as a blind, took the Oxford M. D., 1657. On Cromwell's death he again went to Paris, and returned to England at the restoration. He died at Chertsey, 1667, and was buried in Westminster abbey.

Cowper, William, English poet, was born, 1731, died 1800. He was admitted to the bar in 1754, but did not practice. He passed many years at Olney, Buckinghamshire, in the society of Mrs. Unwin, Lady Austen, and the Rev. John Newton, engaged in religious exercises and charities. Lady Austen turned his attention to poetry, and after contributing sixty-eight pieces to the Olney Hymns, he published in 1782 his first volume, which was tolerably well received. The ballad of John Gilpin gave him a wide renown. His longest original poem, The Task, 1785, gained general popularity. He next translated Homer in blank verse, and undertook a new edition of Milton, with translations of the Latin and Italian poems. In 1799 he revised his Homer, and wrote his last poem, The Castaway.

Cox, David, noted landscape painter, was born at Deritend, a suburb of Birmingham, England, 1783. He studied in London with John Varley; in 1805-06 visited North Wales, which to the end of his life was his favorite sketching-ground; taught as a drawing-master from 1814 to 1826 in Hereford, publishing A Treatise on Landscape Painting. From 1827 till 1841 London was his headquarters, but in 1841 settled at Harborne, near Birmingham, where he died, 1859. It was during this period that he produced his greatest works. Among his oil pictures are "Lancaster Castle"; "Peace and War"; "The Vale of Clwyd"; "The Skylark"; "Boys Fishing"; and "Bettws-y-Coed Church." Crompton, Samuel, inventor of the spinning-mule; born near Bolton, England, 1753; for five years he worked at his project, and at last sold it for £60. It revolutionized the manufacture of British muslin, and brought wealth to all save the inventor, who died in comparative poverty, 1827.

Cromwell, Oliver. See page 449.

Cromwell, Richard, born in 1626, was the third son of Oliver, but by the deaths of two elder brothers, Robert and Oliver, became his father's heir. He was an amiable and popular but weak man, devoted to field sports and pleasure. When the protector had been empowered to nominate his successor, an effort was made to train Richard to the work of government, but in vain. Scarcely had he entered on the protectorship when the forces of anarchy, both parliamentary and military, broke loose; finding himself unable to restrain them, and deep in debt, he abdicated in 1659. After the restoration he lived abroad as John Clarke; but he returned to England about 1680, and lived and died (1712) at Cheshunt.

Cromwell, Thomas, earl of Essex, English statesman, born about 1485. He was in the service of Wolsey for several years before the cardinal's ruin in 1529, and remained his steady friend in adversity. His fidelity to his patron and his talents commended him to Henry VIII., who appointed him his secretary and spokesman in the house of commons. This made him the leader of the English reformation. He was soon after made secretary of state and master of the rolls, in 1535 visitor general of all the monasteries, religious houses, and universities of England, and in 1536 lord privy seal, baron, and ecclesiastical viceregent. The visitorial power was executed with great vigor, and sweeping changes were made in the religious system of England. He was created earl of Essex, received valuable estates from the spoils of the monasteries, and was the king's most powerful subject. But he had enemies on all sides, and, having lost the king's favor by his promotion of the marriage with Anne of Cleves, with whom Henry was disgusted, he was beheaded in 1540.

Cromwell, William Nelson, lawyer, was born in 1854; now senior of law firm of Sullivan & Cromwell; specialty is corporation law; organized, 1899, National tube company with a capital of $80,000,000; since then many other corporations; appointed assignee and reorganized Decker, Howell & Company, 1890, and later, Price, McCormick & Company, which had failed for several millions, and put both on paying basis; was officer, director, or counsel of more than twenty of the largest corporations in the United States, and one of organizers of United States steel corporation. Cuvier (kü'-vyā'), Georges Chrétien Léopold Frédéric Dagobert. See page 386.

Cyrus the Great, founder of the Persian monarchy, commonly called Cyrus the Elder, was born about 590 B. C. Much of a legendary character attaches to his birth and early youth. According to Herodotus, he was the son of Cambyses, a Persian noble, and of Mandane, daughter of Astyages, the Medo-Persian king. His birth was a source of alarm to his grandfather, Astyages, who had previously had a dream, the interpretation of which portended that the offspring of Mandane would one day be the ruler of all Asia. He therefore contrived to get the infant into his own hands, and gave it to Harpagus, his chief servant, with orders to put it to death. Harpagus promised to do so, but intrusted it secretly to the care of a herdsman, who brought it up together with his own children. The young Cyrus quickly distinguished himself. Meanwhile, the tyranny of Astyages had made him hateful to his subjects, and, by the help of the crafty Harpagus, Cyrus formed a party among the Medes favorable to his designs. Putting himself at the head of his Persian troops, Cyrus advanced into Media and overthrew the forces of Astyages, 549 B. C. After consolidating his dominions, which was a work of some time, Cyrus proceeded to conquer the surrounding nations. The kingdom of Lydia first yielded, 546 B. C., and its king, the famous Crœsus, fell into his hands. Ultimately, the whole of Asia Minor was subdued. But the crowning triumph of Cyrus was his capture of the city of Babylon, the metropolis of Assyria, 538 B. C., whose king was Labynetus, the Belshazzar of Daniel. Through the instrumentality of Cyrus the Jews were delivered from their captivity, and allowed to return to Palestine. He wished his power to overshadow all Asia, and although his dominions already extended from the Hellespont almost to the Indus, he resolved to subjugate the Scythian peoples, and began an unjust war with the Massagetæ, a nation or tribe who dwelt to the northeast of the Caspian, beyond the Araxes, whose queen was called Tomyris. At first Cyrus was successful, but in the second engagement he was defeated and slain, 529 B. C.

Cyrus the Younger, was born in 424 B. C., son of Darius, and governor of the western provinces of Asia Minor. After unsuccessfully plotting against his elder brother, Artaxerxes, he raised a large army, including about 12,000 Greek soldiers, with which he marched against him, but was defeated and slain at Cunaxa. Xenophon then conducted the retreat of the 10,000 surviving Greeks. Died, 401 B. C.

Danton (dăɴ'-tôɴ'), Georges Jacques, French revolutionist, was born at Arcis-sur-Aube, France, 1759. He was one of the most prominent actors in the first French revolution, and one of its most famous orators. As a member of the national convention, he used all his influence to hasten the execution of the king; and subsequently, as the president of the committee of public safety, he united with the other revolutionary leaders to establish that fatal tribunal under whose authority so many sanguinary judicial murders were committed. He quarreled, however, with Robespierre, by whom he was supplanted; and, by that very tribunal which he himself had established, he was condemned and guillotined in 1794.

D'Arblay (där'-blā'), Frances Burney, English novelist; born at Lynn Regis, England, 1752, was the third child of Dr. Charles Burney. From the age of eighteen to twenty-six she worked at Evelina, which appeared anonymously in 1778, and won her fame, and the admiration and friendship of Dr. Johnson. Cecilia was equally successful; her works gained her a position at the English court in 1786, and in her Diary she gives a graphic description of its decorous dullness. In 1793 she married General D'Arblay, a French refugee. Her later works are Camilla, The Wanderer, and the Memoirs of her father. Died at Bath, England, 1840.

Darius (dȧ-rī'-ŭs), king of Persia, was born in 558 B. C., son of Hystaspes; dethroned Smerdis the usurper, and became king of Persia in 521, in succession to Cambyses. He captured Babylon after a siege of twenty months, conquered Thrace, and defeated the Scythians. He sent two armies to Greece to avenge the destruction of Sardis by the Athenians, the first of which was repulsed by the Thracians, and the second by the Athenians at Marathon in 490. He died in 486 B. C., while organizing a third expedition. He was a ruler of marked caution, skill, and energy.

Darius III., Codomannus, the last ruler of the Persian empire, 336–330 B. C. Shortly after ascending the throne he had to resist the advance of the Greeks under Alexander. His satraps were defeated at the river Granicus in 334, and Darius, having collected an immense army, was himself defeated at Issus, 333, where his mother, wife, sister, and other members of his family were made captive. At the battle of Arbela, 331, the Persian army, said to have consisted of more than 1,000,000 men, was completely routed. Darius fled to Ecbatana, where he collected a new force. Alexander pursued him thither, but before he came up with him Darius was assassinated by Bessus, satrap of Bactria, 330 B. C.

Darley (där'-lĭ), Felix O. C., American artist, was born at Philadelphia, Pa., 1822. Though a painter of merit, he is especially known for his work as an illustrator. Among his best known works are his outline drawings for Irving's Legend of Sleepy Hollow and Rip Van Winkle. He also illustrated Cooper's and Dickens's novels, and many other works. Some of the finest figures and scenes on the government bonds and legal tender notes were designed by him. In 1868 he published, after a visit to Europe, Sketches Abroad with Pen and Pencil. He executed four large pictures for Prince Napoleon. Died, 1888.

Darling, Grace, English heroine, born, 1815; died, 1842. With the assistance of her father, who was keeper of the Longstone lighthouse on one of the Farne islands, she rescued nine of the survivors of the wreck of the Forfarshire steamer, September 7, 1838.

Darnley (därn'-lĭ), Lord, Henry Stuart, husband of Mary, queen of Scots, the eldest son of the earl of Lennox by Lady Margaret Douglas, was born in England, 1545, where also he was educated. He was handsome in appearance, accomplished in manners, but fatally destitute of all moral and intellectual power. He is interesting chiefly on account of the position which he occupied with respect to his wife and his tragic end in 1567. He was father of James I. of England.

Darrow, Clarence S., lawyer and socialist, was born in Kinsman, Ohio, 1857; studied law, and was admitted to bar, 1875. Formerly attorney for Northwestern railway. Darwin. See page 402.

Darwin, Erasmus, English poet and physician; born in Elston, near Newark, England, 1731. He studied at Cambridge, obtained a degree in medicine at Edinburgh, in 1755, and settled at Lichfield as a physician. He was a man of great and varied talent, and although some of his opinions were deemed extravagantly eccentric at the time, his ideas have been appreciated and utilized by later writers. His Botanic Garden was admired as a fine specimen of polished verse, and his Zoönomia, or The Laws of Organic Life, was admitted to be ingenious, though built upon an hypothesis which was repudiated as absurd. He died in 1802.

D'Aubigne, Jean-Henri Merle. See Merle d'Aubigne.

Daubigny (dō'-bēn'-yĕ'), Charles François, French landscape painter, was born in Paris, 1817. His paintings have great merit, as have also his etchings and designs on wood. Among his best known paintings are "The Vintage"; "The Harvest"; "The Lake of Gylien"; "The Graves of Villerville"; "The Banks of the Oise"; etc. He was made chevalier of the legion of honor, 1857. Died, 1878.

Daudet (dō'-dĕ'), Alphonse, French novelist, was born at Nimes, France, 1840; was educated at the Lyons Lycée, and, when only seventeen, set out for Paris with his brother, Ernest, who became a journalist and novelist of some mark, and both obtained appointments as clerk or private secretary in the office of the Duc de Morny. Alphonse's poem Les Amoureuses, published in 1858, was followed by the theatrical pieces (written partly in collaboration), La Derniere Idole; L'Œillet Blanc; Le Frere Aine; Le Sacrifice; Lise Tavernier; and L'Arlesienne. In the journals appeared some of his best work, Lettres de Mon Moulin; Robert Helmont; Contes du Lundi, and the charming extravaganza of Tartarin de Tarascon, carried further in Tartarin sur les Alpes, and Port Tarascon. He died in 1897.

Daun (doun), Leopold Joseph, Graf von, Austrian general, was born at Vienna, 1705; served against the Turks and through the war of the Austrian succession, and in 1754 was made a field-marshal. In the seven years' war he neutralized the Austrian defeat under Browne near Prague by driving Frederick the Great, who had beleaguered that city, to Kolin, and forcing him to evacuate Bohemia. In 1758 he gained another victory at Hochkirch, and came near to annihilating the Prussian army. In 1759 at Maxen he forced Fink to surrender with 11,000 men. After this, however, he gained no important successes, Frederick having grasped the tactics of "the Austrian Fabius Cunctator." Died, 1766.

Davenport, Homer Calvin, cartoonist, was born in Silverton, Ore., 1867; he never attended art schools, and had little school education; was jockey, railroad fireman, clown in circus, and horseman. In 1892 was employed on San Francisco Examiner, and taken to New York by W. R. Hearst, 1895, and placed on New York Journal; originated the Mark Hanna $-mark suit of clothes and the giant figure of the trusts in 1899; his work caused attempt to pass anti-cartoon bill in New York, 1897. David, king of Israel, was the son of Jesse, of the tribe of Judah; was born in Bethlehem, and flourished in the eleventh century B. C. He watched the flocks of his father, when Samuel the prophet went to Bethlehem to proclaim him king of Israel in the place of Saul, who had been rejected. War having broken out between the Israelites and the Philistines, he fought and vanquished the giant Goliath. Saul gave him the command of a body of men, but having conceived a great hatred of him, David was exposed to imminent danger, and compelled to seek a refuge among the Philistines. After the death of Saul, he was recognized as king of Israel, and defeated the Philistines, the Moabites, the Syrians, and the Ammonites. Many acts of weakness were committed by him, but he obtained forgiveness from Jehovah by exemplary penitence. He transported the ark to Jerusalem, and is the reputed author of many of the psalms.

David, Félicien, French composer, was born at Cadenet, France, 1810; was first a chorister in Aix cathedral, then at twenty entered the Paris conservatory. He became an ardent disciple of St. Simon and of Enfantin; and finally, on the break-up of the brotherhood in 1833, betook himself, with several of his fellow-dreamers, to the East. From Constantinople the enthusiasts made their way to Smyrna and Cairo; as they had no means, they suffered greatly from want, sickness, and ill-usage. In 1835 he returned to Paris, and published his Mélodies Orientales for the pianoforte. They were unsuccessful; and David remained in obscurity until his Désert made him known. His later works were: Moïse sur le Sinaï; Christophe Colombe; La Perle du Bresil; Herculaneum; and Lalla Rookh. In 1862 he was made an officer of the legion of honor, and in 1869 librarian to the Paris conservatory. Died, 1876.

David, Jacques Louis, founder of the modern French school of painting, was born at Paris, 1748; studied at Paris and Rome, and during the revolution was artistic superintendent of those grand national fêtes and solemnities that recalled the customs of ancient Greece. As a member of the convention he voted for the death of Louis XVI.; he was a zealous Jacobin, and a member of the committee of public safety, in all the atrocities of which he shared, and in consequence was twice imprisoned after the fall of Robespierre. In 1804 Napoleon appointed him his first painter, and gave him a number of commissions; among his most celebrated works are several historic portraits of the emperor, such as "Napoleon Crossing the Alps." As one of the judges of Louis XVI. he was banished in 1816 from France, and died at Brussels, 1825.

David, Pierre Jean, French sculptor, known as David d'Angers, was born at Angers, France, 1789. In spite of the opposition of his father, a wood-carver, he resolved to become an artist; and, tramping to Paris in 1808, placed himself under Jacques Louis David, the painter. In 1811 his relievo of the "Death of Epaminondas" gained the grand prix, and David proceeded to Rome, where he became intimate with Canova. In 1816 he returned to France. A statue of the great Condé established his reputation; and in 1826 he was elected to the institute and appointed a professor in the school of the fine arts. During the July revolution David fought in the ranks of the people; in 1835–37 he executed the pediment of the Pantheon in Paris. Among his other works are busts of Washington and Lafayette in the capitol at Washington, a statue of Jefferson in New York, and the tomb of Marco Bozzaris, at Missolonghi, Greece. He died in Paris, 1856.

Davids, T. W. Rhys, English orientalist, professor of comparative religion, Manchester, since 1904, was born at Colchester, 1843. He was educated at Brighton school and Breslau university; LL. Davidson, Samuel, biblical critic, was born near Ballymena, Ireland, 1807, and educated at the royal college, Belfast; was professor successively at Belfast and in a Congregationalist college at Manchester, but, regarded as too "advanced," resigned in 1857. He was a member of the old testament revision committee. His works include Sacred Hermeneutics; Treatise on Biblical Criticism; Introduction to the Old and New Testaments (5 vols.); Canon of the Bible, and Doctrine of Last Things. He died, 1898.

Davis, Henry Gassaway, capitalist, was born in Baltimore, Md., 1823; educated at county schools; became superintendent of a plantation, then brakeman, conductor, and later agent at Piedmont, W. Va., of the Baltimore & Ohio railroad; later merchant and a leading collier; projected and carried on to success the West Virginia Central & Pittsburgh railway, which was sold to the Wabash, 1902; then built the Coal & Coke railway of West Virginia, of 200 miles, of which he is president; also president of Davis Trust company of Elkins, etc.; member of house of delegates, West Virginia, 1865; state senator, 1868–71; United States senator, 1871–83, declining reëlection; one of American delegates to Pan-American congress; is member of United States intercontinental railway commission; was candidate of democratic party for vice-president, 1904.

Davis, Henry Winter, American lawyer, legislator, and orator, was born at Annapolis, Md., in 1817. He graduated at Kenyon college, Ohio, in 1837, and from the law department of the university of Virginia; practiced law in Virginia, and latterly in Baltimore. He was a member of congress, from Maryland, 1855–61 and 1863–65. He was an eloquent speaker, and acted with the "American" party. Soon after the civil war began he became a radical republican, and in 1860 was offered the nomination for the vice-presidency, but refused the honor. He strenuously advocated the emancipation of the slaves and the extension to them of the rights of suffrage. Was chairman of the committee of foreign affairs in the thirty-eighth congress, 1863–65. He died at Baltimore in 1865.

Davis, Jefferson, American statesman and soldier, was born in Kentucky, 1808; was graduated from West Point, 1828; first made himself conspicuous as a member of the house of representatives, and afterward of the United States senate, in which he represented the state of Mississippi. At the commencement of the Mexican war he left congress, engaged actively in the contest, and soon acquired distinction. When Pierce was elected president in 1853, Davis was appointed secretary of war; at this period he exercised a powerful influence in the administration — ruling, in fact, the president as well as the greater number of the members of the cabinet. When Buchanan became president, he left the cabinet, but was returned to the senate by the legislature of Mississippi, which position he retained until the secession of his state. In February, 1861, Davis was chosen president of the Confederate States, and reëlected for six years in 1862. The manner in which the new constitution was drawn up by Davis, his military skill, administrative capacity, and unwearied activity very fully justified the choice; and his disinterestedness endeared him to the South. After the fall of Richmond, in 1865, he was captured when endeavoring to escape, and was imprisoned in Fortress Monroe for two years. He was released on bail in 1867, and finally set at liberty by the general amnesty of 1868. Published The Rise and Fall of the Confederate Government, 1881. Died at New Orleans, 1889.

Davis, Jefferson, lawyer, United States senator, was born in Little River county, Arkansas, 1862; graduated from the law department of Vanderbilt university, 1884; admitted to bar the same year. He was elected prosecuting attorney of the fifth judicial district of Arkansas in 1892, and reëlected in 1894; elected attorney-general of the state in 1898; governor of Arkansas in 1901, reëlected in 1903, and 1905; delegate at large to the democratic national convention in 1904; was elected to the United States senate, 1907, for the term 1907–13. Died, 1913.

Davis, John, English navigator, was born at Sandridge, near Dartmouth, about 1550, and undertook in 1585–87 three Arctic voyages in search of a northwest passage. In the last voyage he sailed with a barque of apparently not over twenty tons as far as 73 degrees N. lat., and discovered Davis strait. He next made two ill-fated voyages toward the South seas and as pilot of a Dutch vessel to the East Indies. In his last voyage as pilot of an English ship he was killed by Japanese pirates in the strait of Malacca, 1605.

Davis, Richard Harding, novelist, journalist, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., 1864. He graduated from Lehigh university, subsequently studied at Johns Hopkins, and began his journalistic career on Philadelphia papers. He served as war correspondent for the London Times and New York Herald in Turkish-Greek, Spanish-American, South African, and Russian-Japanese wars. Author: Soldiers of Fortune; Our English Cousins; Van Bibber and Others; The Rulers of the Mediterranean; Three Gringos in Venezuela; Cuba in War Time; A Year From a Correspondent's Note-Book; Cuban and Porto Rican Campaigns; Cinderella and Other Stories; Dr. Jameson's Raiders; Exiles; The King's Jackal; The Lion and the Unicorn; The West From a Car Window; Episodes in Van Bibber's Life; With Both Armies in South Africa; In the Fog; Ranson's Folly; Captain Macklin; The Bar Sinister; The Man Who Could Not Lose, etc. Plays: Taming of Helen; Ranson's Folly; The Dictator; The Yankee Tourist; Blackmail; etc.

Davitt (dăv′-ĭt), Michael, Irish journalist and political leader, was born at Straid, Ireland, in 1846. The family emigrated to Haslingden in Lancashire, England, 1851; and here in 1857 the boy lost his right arm through a machinery accident in a cotton-factory. In 1866 he joined the Fenian movement, and was sentenced in 1870 to fifteen years' penal servitude. He was released in 1877; and, supplied with funds from the United States, began an anti-landlord crusade which culminated in the Irish land league, 1879. Davitt was thenceforward in frequent collision with the government, and from February, 1881, to May, 1882, was imprisoned. His Leaves From a Prison Diary was published in 1885. A strong home ruler, but socialistic on the question of land nationalization, after the split in the party he opposed Parnell, and was elected to parliament in 1892 as an anti-Parnellite, but unseated on the ground of intimidation. In 1895 he was returned unopposed by South Mayo, but resigned in 1899. He died in 1906.

Davout (dä′-vōō′), Louis Nicolas, French marshal, was born in 1770, at Annoux, France; was educated with Bonaparte at the military school of Brienne. As general he accompanied Bonaparte to the East, and mainly secured the victory at Aboukir. A marshal of the empire, 1804, he acted a brilliant part at Austerlitz, 1805, and Auerstädt, and was made duke of Auerstädt, 1808. At Eckmühl and at Wagram he checked the Austrian attack, and in 1811 was created prince of Eckmühl; became governor of Poland, and ruled that country with the harshest despotism; in the Russian campaign of 1812 he gathered fresh laurels on the fields of Mohilev and Vitebsk. After the retreat from Moscow he became governor-general of the Hanse towns. On Bonaparte's return from Elba he was appointed war minister; and after Waterloo he received the command of the remnant of the French army under the walls of Paris. In 1819 he was made a peer of France. He died in 1823.

Davy, Sir Humphry, noted English chemist, was born at Penzance, in Cornwall, 1778. He was educated at various local schools, and, 1798, was made laboratory assistant in Beddoes institution at Bristol. Two papers on nitrous oxide obtained for him the post of assistant lecturer on chemistry to the royal institution, London, and in a few weeks he was raised to the chief lectureship. In 1803 he became a fellow, and in 1807 secretary of the royal society. His Bakerian lecture in 1806 gained him the 3,000-franc prize of the French institute. In 1815 he invented the miner's safety lamp. He was knighted in 1812, made a baronet and elected a president of the royal society in 1820. Failing health compelled him to leave England, and he died at Geneva in 1829, of paralysis. His chief works are Elements of Chemical Philosophy, and Elements of Agricultural Chemistry.

Dawson, George Mercer, Canadian geologist, was born at Pictou, Nova Scotia, 1849. He was educated at McGill university, Montreal, and at the royal school of mines, London. In 1875 he was appointed to the geological survey of Canada, and carried on explorations in the Canadian Northwest, British Columbia, and the Yukon region. In 1891 he was appointed one of the Bering sea commissioners, and in the same year was awarded the Bigsby medal of the geological society of London for his researches in geology of the Canadian Dominion. In 1893 he became president of the royal society of Canada, and was made a companion of the order of St. Michael and St. George. The results of his investigations are published in reports of the geological survey of Canada, and contain the first detailed account of the surface geology and glacial phenomena of the northern part of the American continent west of the lakes. Died at Ottawa, 1901.

Dawson, Sir John William, Canadian geologist and naturalist, was born at Pictou, Nova Scotia, 1820; studied at Edinburgh, and afterward devoted himself to the natural history and geology of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. He was appointed superintendent of education in Nova Scotia in 1850; and from 1855 to 1893 was principal of McGill university, Montreal. In 1882 he received the Lyell medal of the London geological society, was knighted in 1884; and in 1886 was president of the British association. A systematic anti-Darwinian, he died in 1899. Among his works are Archaia; Story of the Earth and Man; Dawn of Life; Origin of the World; Fossil Men; Egypt and Syria; The Meeting-place of Geology and History; and Relics of Primeval Life. He was not only a distinguished scientist but one of the most noted American educators.

Deane, Silas, American statesman and diplomat, was born in Connecticut, 1737; graduated from Yale, and was a member of the first continental congress. In 1776 he was sent to Paris as political and financial agent of the colonies. Benjamin Franklin and Arthur Lee joined him afterward, and he was on the committee which negotiated the treaty of peace with France. He was recalled in 1777 in consequence of extravagant contracts in which he had involved the colonies. An account of his actions was demanded on the floor of congress, but a full explanation was declined on the ground that his papers were in Europe. The affair put him under a cloud, and after many defensive and aggressive publications on the subject, he returned to Europe, 1784, and died, 1789.

De Armond, David Albaugh, lawyer, jurist, congressman, was born in Blair county, Pennsylvania, 1844; educated in common schools and at Williamsport Dickinson seminary; settled in Missouri and practiced law at Butler; presidential elector, 1884; served as state senator, circuit judge, and Missouri supreme court commissioner. In 1804 he led a small party which burned, in the harbor of Tripoli, the American frigate Philadelphia after its capture by the Tripolitans. For this exploit he was raised to the rank of captain. Having taken command of the frigate United States, he captured the British frigate Macedonian, 1812. In 1815 he captured two Algerine vessels of war, and compelled the dey of Algiers to sue for peace. He was killed in a duel by Commodore James Barron, 1820.

Deffand (dĕ'-fäɴ'), Marie de Vichy-Chamrond, Marquise du, Parisian literary leader, was born at the Château de Chamrond, France, 1697, was educated in a Paris convent, and as a girl became famous for her wit, audacity, and beauty. In 1718 she married the Marquis du Deffand, but they soon separated; and for a number of years she led a life of gallantry and became a conspicuous figure in Paris literary society. She was a correspondent of Voltaire, Montesquieu, D'Alembert, Horace Walpole, and other celebrated men of her time. She became blind in 1753, but still retained her relish for society. Died in Paris, 1780.

De Foe (dĕ fō'), Daniel, English novelist and political writer, was born in London, 1661. He began his career as author in 1682, by publishing a pamphlet which contained strictures upon the clergy of that day. This was followed in 1683 by another pamphlet entitled A Treatise Against the Turks. In 1685 he took part in the rebellion of the duke of Monmouth, but luckily escaped being punished on its suppression. After this he engaged in trade, but a series of misfortunes finally led him to forsake it. In 1701 he published his famous satirical poem, The True-born Englishman, which was written in vindication of King William, and in answer to a poem in which he had been attacked, called The Foreigners. In 1719 appeared the famous Robinson Crusoe, the most popular of all his works. De Foe, in rapid succession, produced his other notable works of fiction, Moll Flanders; Journal of the Plague; Colonel Jack; Adventures of Roxana, and the Memoirs of a Cavalier. He died in 1731.

Defregger (dā'-frĕg-ĕr), Franz von, Austrian genre painter of deserved popularity, was born at Stronach, Tyrol, 1835. He studied under Piloty at Munich in 1867, and his "Speckbacher," a picture of the Tyrolese uprising under Hofer, brought him immediate fame. In 1878 he was made professor of painting at the Munich academy. The subjects of almost all his pictures are drawn from the Tyrolese peasant-life. His chief pictures are "Before the Dance"; "The Prize Horse"; "Victors' Return"; "Hofer Going to His Death," and a "Madonna."

Many of his subjects are drawn from English and French history, and they are usually of a somber character: "The Death of the Princes in the Tower"; "The Death of Lady Jane Grey"; "The Death of Queen Elizabeth"; "Joan of Arc"; "Napoleon at St. Bernard"; etc. His most important work is the famous hemicycle covering the semicircular wall of the hall in the École des Beaux-Arts, Paris.

Delcassé (dĕl'-kȧ'-sā'), Theophile, French statesman, was born in Pamiers, France, 1852; educated in Paris, and began his career as a journalist. He was elected to the chamber of deputies in 1889, for Foix; in 1893, became under-secretary for the colonies under MM. Ribot and Dupuy, and colonial minister in the Dupuy cabinet of 1894. He has always been a consistent advocate of colonial expansion. When M. Brisson formed his ministry in 1898, he intrusted foreign affairs to M. Delcassé, and it fell to his lot to deal with the difficult position at Fashoda. He retained his portfolio in M. Dupuy's ministry, after the defeat of the Brisson administration. In 1899 he negotiated the agreement with Great Britain as to the Nile valley and central Africa, and still remained foreign minister when M. Waldeck-Rousseau succeeded M. Dupuy, and when M. Combes, in 1902, succeeded M. Waldeck-Rousseau. He brought about the rapprochement with Italy, visited England with the president in 1903, and with Lord Lansdowne prepared the Anglo-French agreement, signed in 1904. The difficulty with Germany about Morocco caused his retirement in 1905.

Delille (dē-lēl'), Jacques, French poet, was born in Auvergne, France, 1738. He was educated at the Collège de Lisieux in Paris, and obtained a professorship in Amiens. His verse translation of Virgil's Georgics had an extraordinary success, and its author was made an academician in 1774. Les Jardins, a didactic poem, was generally accepted as a masterpiece. The revolution compelled Delille to leave France, and he traveled in Switzerland and Germany, and then in London occupied eighteen months in translating Paradise Lost. After his return to France in 1802 he produced a translation of the Æneid; L'Imagination; Les Trois Regnes, and La Conversation. Blind in his old age, he died in 1813. During his life he was regarded by his countrymen as the greatest French poet of the day, and was even declared the equal of Virgil and Homer.

Delitzsch (dā'-lich), Franz, German theologian and Hebraist, was born at Leipzig, 1813; died there in 1890. He was professor of theology at Rostock in 1846, at Erlangen in 1850, and at Leipzig in 1867. His vast learning gave him a foremost place among conservative German theologians, while his great personal influence over a generation of Leipzig students and a long series of profoundly learned books extended a sound knowledge of old testament exegesis in Germany, England, and America.

He wrote Helena's Household; The Dodge Club; Cord and Creese; The Lady of the Ice; The Cryptogram; The American Baron; An Open Question; Babes in the Woods, and The Living Link. Died at Halifax, Nova Scotia, 1880.

Democritus (de-mŏk'-rĭ-tŭs), Greek philosopher, was born at Abdera, in Thrace, about 470 or 460 B. C. He was by far the most learned thinker of his age. The period of his death is uncertain. He lived, however, to a great age. Only a few fragments of his numerous physical, mathematical, ethical, and musical works are extant. Cicero praised his style, and Pyrrhon imitated it. Democritus' system of philosophy is known as the atomic system. Its essence consists in the attempt to explain the different phenomena of nature — not like the earlier Ionic philosophers, by maintaining that the original characteristics of matter were qualitative, but that they were quantitative. Died about 357 or 360 B. C.

Demosthenes (dē-mŏs'-thē-nēz). See page 19.

Deneen, Charles Samuel, lawyer, public official, was born in Edwardsville, Ill., 1863; graduated from McKendree college, 1882; studied law, and was admitted to the Illinois bar. Elected to Illinois house of representatives, 1892; served one term as attorney for sanitary district of Chicago, 1895-96; state's attorney of Cook county, Ill., 1896–1904; governor of Illinois, 1905-13.

Depew, Chauncey Mitchell, lawyer, railroad executive, ex-United States senator, was born in Peekskill, N. Y., 1834; was graduated at Yale college in 1856; studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1858; LL. D., Yale, 1887. He was appointed United States minister to Japan, and, after holding the commission a month, declined, and began his career as a railroad official and attorney for the New York and Harlem railroad. He was made attorney and director of the consolidated Hudson River and New York Central railroads in 1869; general counsel of the whole Vanderbilt system in 1875; second vice-president of the reorganized New York Central railroad in 1882, and president in 1885. He resigned in 1898 to become chairman of the consolidated board of directors of the New York Central, the Lake Shore, the Michigan Central, and the New York, Chicago and St. Louis railroad companies. He was candidate for the presidential nomination in the republican national convention in 1888; was elected to the United States senate, 1899, and reëlected, 1905. He has an international reputation as an orator, is constantly in request as a lecturer, and has delivered many addresses of public importance.

De Quincey, Thomas, English essayist, born in Manchester, England, in 1785. He was first educated at Salford and at Bath, and afterward at Winkfield and the Manchester grammar school, from which he ran away, and subsequently went through the adventures and privations which he described, in 1821, in the Confessions of an English Opium Eater. In 1803 he entered Worcester college, Oxford, which he left without a degree, and soon after became acquainted with Coleridge and Wordsworth, took a cottage at Grasmere, and became a member of the famous "lake school." Here he remained for many years, occasionally visiting London and Edinburgh. In 1830 he removed his wife and eight children to the latter place, and lived there until his wife's death, in 1837. He had acquired the habit of taking opium by using it to cure an attack of neuralgia, and so greatly did it grow upon him that he was known to take as many as 12,000 drops, equal to ten wineglasses, in a day. He was engaged in preparing fourteen volumes of his works for the press within a few days of his death. Besides the Confessions, the following works may be mentioned: Murder Considered as One of the Fine Arts, Suspiria de Profundis, The English Mail Coach, and A Vision of Sudden Death. Died, 1859.

Derby, Edward George Geoffrey Smith-Stanley, fourteenth Earl of, British statesman, was born in 1799. He entered parliament in 1821, and in 1827-28 was under-secretary for the colonies. In the reform government of Lord Grey he became in 1830 chief secretary for Ireland, with a seat in the cabinet, and in 1833 secretary of state for the colonies. In 1841 he became colonial secretary in Peel's cabinet. In 1844 he was called to the house of lords as Baron Stanley of Bickerstaffe, and assumed the leadership of the conservative party in that body. He left the cabinet in 1845 and became the leader of the protectionist opposition. During the six years of Lord Russell's premiership, Lord Stanley was the leader of the opposition in the upper house. On the death of his father, in 1851, he succeeded to the earldom and the vast estates in England and Ireland. He declined the premiership in 1845 and in 1851, but accepted it in 1852, and resigned it the same year. In 1858 he became first lord of the treasury. Being defeated on a measure of parliamentary reform, he dissolved parliament; but after the assembling of the new house of commons, he was forced to resign in 1859. He became prime minister a third time in 1866, and resigned in 1868. In 1864 he published a translation of the Iliad in blank verse. Died, 1869.

He had acquired fame as a hunter before he became conspicuous in the Transvaal war of 1880-81; and in the Boer war of 1899–1902 he was of all the Boer commanders the most audacious, swift in movement, and fertile in expedients. After the submission he went to Europe as a commissioner to raise money for the distressed Boer families.

De Wette (dĕ vĕt′-ĕ), Wilhelm Martin Leberecht, German biblical critic, born at Ulla, near Weimar, 1780. He studied from 1799 at Jena, and became professor at Heidelberg in 1807, in 1810 at Berlin, and in 1822 at Basel, Switzerland, where he died, 1849. His reputation rests on his Introduction to the Old Testament, translated by Theodore Parker, 1850, his Manual of Hebrew Archæology, and his Introduction to the New Testament.

Dewey, George, admiral in United States navy; born in Montpelier, Vt., 1837; appointed to naval academy, September 23, 1854; graduated in 1858, as passed midshipman; LL. D., university of Pennsylvania, Princeton university, 1898. Attached to steam frigate Wabash, Mediterranean squadron, until 1861; then to steam sloop Mississippi of west gulf squadron; commissioned lieutenant, April 19, 1861; in Farragut's squadron which forced the passage of Fort St. Philip and Fort Jackson, April, 1862, and participated in the attack on Fort St. Philip and the subsequent fights with gunboats and ironclads, which gave Farragut possession of New Orleans. In the smoke of the battle of Port Hudson, the Mississippi lost her bearings and ran ashore under the guns of the land batteries, and the officers and men took to the boats after setting the vessel on fire. Was afterward on several vessels in North Atlantic blockading squadron, then in European squadron, and later on various duties and at different stations, being promoted to commander, 1872; captain, 1884; commodore, 1896. In January, 1898, assumed command of Asiatic squadron. On May 1, 1898, in Manila bay, he commanded in the greatest naval battle since Trafalgar, completely annihilating the Spanish Asiatic squadron under Admiral Montojo, destroying eleven and capturing all other vessels and all the land batteries, without the loss of a man on the American side. Immediately upon receipt of official news of victory he was promoted to rear-admiral, and thanked by resolution of congress; member of United States Philippine commission, 1899; promoted to admiral, 1899.

De Witt (dĕ vĭt′), Jan, Dutch statesman, was born at Dort, 1625, son of Jacob De Witt, a vehement opponent of William II., prince of Orange. Jan inherited his father's hatred of the office of stadtholder, and the family that filled it. He was carefully educated, and soon exhibited remarkable ability. He was one of the deputies sent by the states of Holland in 1652 to Zealand for the purpose of dissuading that province from adopting an Orange policy. In 1654, on the conclusion of the war with England, a secret article was inserted in the treaty drawn up between De Witt and Cromwell, in virtue of which the house of Orange was to be deprived of all state offices. After the restoration of Charles II., De Witt leaned more to the side of France. This tendency necessarily received an impetus from the renewal of hostilities between England and Holland in 1665. These lasted for two years; and although De Witt acted with great vigor his influence was diminished, and his party was compelled to concede a larger measure of power to the house of Orange. De Witt's prospects became still more clouded when the designs of Louis XIV. upon the Spanish Netherlands became manifest. The Orange party carried their point in the elevation of William to the family and dignity of stadtholder. On the invasion of the Netherlands by Louis XIV. in 1672, the prince of Orange was appointed commander of the Dutch forces; and the first campaign proving unfortunate, the popular clamor against De Witt greatly increased. His brother, Cornelius, accused of conspiracy against the life of the stadtholder, was imprisoned and tortured. De Witt went to see him on his release. As they were coming out of prison they were attacked and murdered, 1672.

De Young, Michel Harry, journalist, was born in St. Louis, Mo., 1849; removed to California with parents when five years old; with brother Charles he established, 1865, The Dramatic Chronicle, later changing it to the San Francisco Chronicle, which they made a leading newspaper; on his brother's death, 1880, he became sole proprietor and editor-in-chief. Commissioner from California to Paris exposition, 1889; candidate for United States senator, 1892; commissioner and vice-president of World's Columbian national commission, 1892–93; projector and director-general of California midwinter exposition, 1893-94; ex-president of international league of press clubs; United States commissioner and president of United States commission, Paris exposition, 1900. Vice-president and director of concessions, Panama-Pacific international exposition.

Diaz (dē′-äs), or Dias, Bartolomeu, Portuguese navigator, flourished in the fifteenth century. His residence at the court of John II. brought him into contact with many scientific men, and in 1486 the king gave him the command of two vessels to follow up the discoveries already made on the west coast of Africa. Driven by a violent storm, he sailed round the southern extremity of Africa, the cape of Good Hope, without immediately realizing the fact, and discovered Algoa bay. The discontent of his crew compelled him to return; and arriving in Lisbon, December, 1487, he was at first greeted with enthusiasm. But in the expedition of 1497 he had to act under Vasco da Gama, who even sent him back to Portugal after they had reached the Cape Verde isles. Three years later he joined the expedition of Cabral, the discoverer of Brazil, but was lost in a storm, May, 1500.

Diaz, Porfirio, Mexican statesman, ex-president of Mexico, was born at Oaxaca in 1830. He studied law, and was an officer in the war between Mexico and the United States. In 1863 he was military governor of the state of Vera Cruz, and commanded the army in the war with France. He was captured and sent to France, but escaped and was in command of the army which overthrew Maximilian in 1867, thus ending the war with France. In 1876 he rebelled and overthrew the president, Lerdo de Tejado, and was himself made president in the same year. He was elected again in 1884, 1888, 1892, 1896, 1900, 1904, and 1908. Resigned, 1911. Mexico greatly prospered under his administration, and his career has given him a high place among the world's statesmen.

Diaz de la Peña (dē′-äz′ dě lä pěn′-yä′), Narcisse Virgile, French painter, was born at Bordeaux of Spanish parentage, 1807. Left dependent, he was educated by a Protestant pastor at Bellevue, near Paris. A snake-bite occasioned the amputation of a leg; at fifteen he was apprenticed to a porcelain painter; in 1831 he began to exhibit in the salon. His favorite subjects were landscapes with nymphs, loves, and satyrs, which he executed with rare skill. He died at Mentone, 1876.

Dicey (dī′-sĭ), Albert Venn, British lawyer and writer, Vinerian professor of English law at Oxford, 1882-1909; was born in 1835; graduated from Balliol college, Oxford; M. A., hon. D. C. L., Oxford; hon. LL. D., Cambridge, Glasgow, and Edinburgh; studied law and was made a barrister of the Inner Temple, 1863. Author: The Law of Domicil; Law of the Constitution; England's Case Against Home Rule; Treatise on the Conflict of Laws; Lectures on the Relation Between Law and Public Opinion in England During the Nineteenth Century; etc.

Dick, Charles, lawyer, ex-United States senator, was born in Akron, Ohio, 1858; educated in public schools, and was store clerk, bank bookkeeper and teller, and later grain commission merchant; studied law, and in 1893 was admitted to Ohio bar. He has been long connected with the Ohio national guard, and is now serving as major-general; engaged in active service with his regiment during Spanish-American war; member of congress, nineteenth Ohio district, 1898–1904; elected United States senator, 1904, for short and long terms to succeed late Senator M. A. Hanna; term expired 1911.

Dickens, Charles, English novelist and humorist, was born at Landport, England, 1812. He was first a parliamentary reporter, and soon became distinguished for his uncommon ability. After a literary apprenticeship on The True Sun, he attached himself to the staff of the London Chronicle. In this newspaper he gave the first evidence of his talents in the lively essays entitled Sketches by Boz, published in 1836. This was followed by the immortal Pickwick Papers and Oliver Twist. After a visit to the United States he published, in 1842, his American Notes for General Circulation; but a much more admirable result of his visit was Martin Chuzzlewit. This was certainly the greatest of his humorous works since the Pickwick Papers, and it may almost be said to have been his last. His humor, except in some rich creations, such as Mr. Micawber, was no longer so apparent, while, on the other hand, his wit and pathos increased. Dombey and Son was below the standard of his other works, but for this he made amends in David Copperfield, which is considered by far his greatest work. Bleak House, Hard Times, Little Dorrit, Tale of Two Cities, Great Expectations, Our Mutual Friend, and other novels equally celebrated succeeded one another with almost periodical punctuality, and an audience larger than any English author ever had awaited each. No prose writer was ever more quotable or more quoted than he. In 1846 the Daily News was started under his editorial auspices, but the task appears to have been uncongenial, for he soon withdrew from it. In 1850 he commenced a weekly periodical entitled Household Words, afterward merged in All the Year Round. In 1867 he again visited the United States, gave numerous readings, and met with a brilliant reception. He was until the last engaged in writing a new novel, The Mystery of Edwin Drood, which was left unfinished at his death in 1870.

Dickinson, Don M., lawyer, was born at Port Ontario, N. Y., 1846, removed to Michigan in 1848, and was educated in the public schools and by private tutors. Graduated from the law department of the university of Michigan in 1867, and since 1867 has been a practicing lawyer in the West, New York, and Washington. He was postmaster-general of the United States, 1887–89; tendered and declined cabinet position, 1893; senior counsel of United States before international high commission on Bering sea claims, 1896-97; member of court of arbitration to adjust controversy between United States and republic of Salvador, 1902. Member of many legal, municipal, financial, historical, and other associations.

Dickinson, Jacob McGavock, lawyer, ex-secretary of war, was born in Columbus, Miss., in 1851; graduated from the university of Nashville and studied law at Columbia college, New York, in Paris, and at the university of Leipzig; LL. D., Columbia, university of Illinois, Yale; was assistant attorney-general of the United States, 1895–97; in 1903 appeared as counsel for the United States before the Alaskan boundary tribunal in London; was for many years general counsel of the Illinois Central railroad company. He became secretary of war in 1909, resigning in 1911.

Dicksee, Francis Bernard, English painter and royal academician, was born in London in 1853. He was educated at Rev. G. Henslow's school, London. First exhibited at academy, 1876; since then has painted "Harmony"; "Evangeline"; "The House Builders"; "The Symbol"; "The Love Story"; "Too Late"; "Romeo and Juliet"; "Chivalry"; "Memories"; "The Passing of Arthur"; "The Redemption of Tannhäuser"; "Mountain of the Winds"; "The Crisis"; "Funeral of a Viking"; "The Magic Crystal"; "Paolo and Francesca"; "The Mirror"; "The Confession"; "The Two Crowns"; "La Belle Dame sans Merci"; "A Duet"; etc.

Diderot (dēd'-rō'), Denis, celebrated French encyclopedist and philosophical writer, was born at Langres, France, 1713. His great work was the Encyclopédie, begun in 1749, of which he and D'Alembert were the joint editors. Diderot, besides revising all the articles, wrote the department of history, of ancient philosophy, and of the mechanical arts. He also wrote art criticisms from 1765 to 1767, showing a readiness in interpreting the meaning of a picture, and a power in reproducing it vividly in words, unequaled by any writer of his time. Toward the latter portion of his life, having never been able to save any money, he determined to sell his library to provide for his only daughter. The empress Catharine of Russia, having been informed by her French ambassador of his intention, bought the library, on condition that he himself should be librarian, and undertake the care of it at a salary of 1,000 francs yearly. In 1773 he set out for St. Petersburg to thank his imperial benefactress, returning in the following year. His health, which was impaired by this journey, soon after gave way, and he died in 1784.

Dielman (dēl'-man), Frederick, American artist, was born in Hanover, Germany, 1847, and came to United States in childhood; graduated at Calvert college; was topographer and draughtsman in United States engineering department, 1866–72; studied art at royal academy, Munich, and opened a studio in New York, 1876. He was president of the national academy of design 1889–1909; member of art commission, New York, 1901–03; etc. Designed mosaic panels "Law" and "History" in new congressional library, and large mosaic, "Thrift," in Albany savings bank, and the decorations in the new building of the Washington Evening Star. Since 1903 he has been professor of descriptive geometry and drawing in the college of the city of New York.

Dilke (dĭlk), Rt. Hon. Sir Charles Wentworth, English statesman and writer, was born at Chelsea, near London, 1843. He was graduated at Cambridge, studied law and was a barrister of the Middle Temple. From 1868–86 he was M. P. for Chelsea; 1892–1911, M. P. for Gloucestershire; was under-secretary of state for foreign affairs, 1880–82; president of local government board, 1882–85; chairman of royal commission for negotiations with France, 1880–82; chairman of royal commission for housing of the working-class, 1884-85; chairman of select committee on income tax, 1906. Author: Greater Britain; The Present Position of European Politics; The British Army; Problems of Greater Britain; British Empire; Memoir of Lady Dilke; etc. Died, 1911.

Dill, James Brooks, lawyer, jurist, was born at Spencerport, N. Y., 1854; graduated at Yale, 1876, New York university law school, 1878; admitted to bar, 1878; for many years a noted corporation lawyer; judge of court of errors and appeals, New Jersey, 1905–10. Author: Business Corporations; Dill on Corporations; Banking and Trust Company Laws of New Jersey, etc. Died, 1910.

Dillingham, William Paul, lawyer, United States senator, was born at Waterbury, Vt., 1843; received an academic education and was admitted to the bar in 1867; was state's attorney for Washington county two terms; commissioner of state taxes for several years; member of the Vermont house of representatives in 1876 and again in 1884; state senator from Washington county in 1878 and again in 1880; and governor of Vermont from 1888 to 1890. In 1900 he was elected United States senator from Vermont to fill a vacancy caused by the death of Justin S. Morrill; in 1902 he was elected to succeed himself, and was reëlected in 1908.

Dillmann (dĭl'-măn), Christian Friedrich August, German orientalist and theologian, was born in Württemberg, 1823. He studied at Tübingen under Ewald, and in 1846–48 visited the libraries at Paris, London, and Oxford, cataloguing Ethiopic MSS., and then returned to Tübingen. In 1854 he accepted a call to Kiel, where he became professor of oriental languages in 1860, but was transferred in 1864 to the chair of old testament exegesis at Giessen, which in 1869 he resigned to become Hengstenberg's successor at Berlin. The first authority on the Ethiopic languages, he became in 1877 a member of the Berlin academy, was president of the fifth international congress of orientalists, and edited its proceedings. Died in 1894.

Dillon, John, Irish politician and leader, was born in New York in 1851, and was educated at the Catholic university of Dublin. He early identified himself with the Parnellite movement, and in 1880 was elected to the British parliament for County Tipperary. In parliament he distinguished himself by the violence of his language, while speeches delivered by him in Ireland led to his imprisonment on several occasions. From 1883 to 1885 he was absent from political life on account of ill-health; but in the latter year he was elected for East Mayo, and has since represented that constituency in parliament. He was one of the chief promoters of the "plan of campaign," a political conspiracy, and was again imprisoned in 1891. In 1896–99 he was Justin McCarthy's successor as head of the anti-Parnellite party.

Dinwiddie (dĭn-wĭd'-ĭ or dĭn'-wĭd-ĭ), Robert, governor of Virginia from 1752 to 1758, was born in Scotland about 1690. His rule as governor was not successful, his ill-temper and avarice making him very disagreeable to his subjects. He was the first to suggest to the British board of trade the taxing of the colonies. He discerned Washington's military ability, and made him adjutant-general of one of the four military districts of Virginia. He died in England in 1770.

Diocletian (dī'-ō-klē'-shan), Valerius Diocletianus, Roman emperor, was born in Dalmatia in 245, and reigned from 284 to 305. He entered the army and held important commands under the emperors Probus and Aurelian. After the death of Numerianus, he was chosen to succeed him by the troops at Chalcedon. With his reign began a new form of government in Rome. He appointed Maximian as his companion in authority, under the title Augustus, and soon after he appointed Constantine and Galerius as subordinate rulers, each with the title of Cæsar. Each of the four rulers had a different capital and governed a different region. In the year 305, Diocletian, being worn out by work, resigned his position as emperor and went to Salona, in Dalmatia, where he died eight years later. His reign has become memorable for the persecution of the Christians.

Diogenes (dī-ŏj'-ē-nēz), philosopher of the school of cynics, was born in Asia Minor about 412 B. C. Becoming a citizen of Athens, he made himself notorious by his abnegation of all social laws and customs, lived upon alms, and took up his abode in a tub. Of his cynicism many well-known anecdotes are related. Died at Corinth, 323 B. C.

Dionysius (dī'-ō-nĭsh'-ĭ-ŭs), the Elder, tyrant of Syracuse, in Sicily, was born about 430 B. C. When Sicily was invaded by the Carthaginians, he became a general in the service of Syracuse, which was then a republic. In the year 405 he made himself tyrant, or ruler of Syracuse. He later continued the war against the Carthaginians, and was at first defeated, but afterward gained a complete victory. He also engaged in many other military expeditions, and was one of the most distinguished rulers of his time. Not content with his military renown, he wrote poems and tragedies, and at one time gained a prize at Athens for the tragedy The Ransom of Hector. He died at Syracuse in 367 B. C.

Dionysius of Halicarnassus, critic, historian, and rhetorician, was born about 66 B. C., went to Rome in 29 B. C., and died there about 7 B. C. His Greek Archæologia, a history of Rome down to 264 B. C., is a mine of information about the constitution, religion, history, laws, and private life of the Romans. Of its twenty books we have only the first nine complete.

Disraeli (dĭz-rā'-lĭ or dĭz-rē'-lĭ), Benjamin, earl of Beaconsfield, eminent statesman and novelist, was born in London in 1804. He entered the house of commons in 1837, and remained a member until his elevation to the house of lords in 1876. His first appearance in the debates of the lower house was not successful; but he speedily made himself famous by his brilliant and acrimonious attacks upon Sir Robert Peel. He became the leader of the old tory or protectionist party, on the death of Lord George Bentinck in 1848. In 1852, and again in 1858 and 1866, he was chancellor of the exchequer under the earl of Derby, and carried the reform act of 1867. In 1868, on the retirement of Lord Derby, he was made premier. His occupancy of the premiership on this occasion was only brief, his government being displaced after a few months by that of Gladstone; but in 1874 he was once more in office, which he held until again defeated by Gladstone in 1880. He was one of the chief authors of the treaty of Berlin of 1878, and was one of the representatives of England at the congress which led to that treaty. Lord Beaconsfield's career as an author was even longer than his political career. His first novel, Vivian Grey, appeared in 1826, when he was little more than twenty-one years of age; his last, Endymion, appeared in 1880, only a few months before his death. Between these years he published a large number of novels, chiefly of a political character, and all remarkable for their brilliancy and for their epigrammatic style. He died at London in 1881.

Dix, John Adams, American statesman and general, was born at Boscawen, N. H., 1798; entered the army in 1812, and rose to the rank of adjutant-general in 1830. Dora d'Istria (dō'-rä dēs'-trē-ä). See Ghika, Helena.

Doré (dō'-rā'), Paul Gustave, French painter and book illustrator, was born in Strassburg in 1833, and educated at a Parisian lycée. He became known by his illustrations of Rabelais and Don Quixote, and for some years was a constant contributor to the Journal pour Rire. At the time of the Crimean war he produced his Alma and Inkermann; in 1861 he published the first of his famous illustrations to Dante's Divine Comedy; and next his illustrations to the Bible, Paradise Lost, The Ancient Mariner, and The Idylls of the King. These works secured for him a greater reputation in England than was accorded to him in his native country. He afterward devoted himself to the production of large pictures on religious subjects, such as "The Dream of Pilate's Wife," "The Entry into Jerusalem," and "Ecce Homo." Died, 1883.

Doria (dō'-rē-ä), Andrea, Genoese naval commander and admiral, who distinguished himself in the service of several states, but chiefly in that of the Genoese republic, was born in 1468. He was the means, in 1528, of delivering Genoa and all Italy from the domination of the French; and for this service was appointed censor of the republic for life. His later years were disturbed only by the ineffectual conspiracy of Fiesco. The Palazzo Doria, which was presented to him by the republic, still remains as a monument to his patriotism, and the reverence in which he was held by his fellow countrymen. Died, 1560.

Dorion (dō'-rē'-ôɴ'), Sir Antoine Aime, Canadian statesman and jurist, was born in the province of Quebec in 1818. He was educated at Nicolet college, early studied law, and in 1842 was admitted to the bar. From 1854 to 1861 he represented Montreal in the old Canadian assembly; member of the Dominion parliament, 1862–67. From 1867 he served on the judiciary of the province of Quebec, first as associate and latterly as chief-justice. He was a member of the British privy council, and was knighted in 1877. Died at Montreal, 1891.

Dorr, Thomas Wilson, American politician, was born in Providence, R. I., 1805; graduated from Harvard, 1823. He was the leader of a party in 1840–41 whose object was to extend the right of suffrage in Rhode Island. This party framed a new constitution, which was voted on in December, 1841, when it was claimed that a clear majority of the male citizens of the state voted for its adoption. In April, 1842, an election for state officers under this constitution was held, and Dorr was chosen governor. In May the new government undertook to organize and assume full power. They were resisted by the regular state government, and made some show of using force, but there was no actual fighting. Before the close of the month the Dorrites were scattered, and their leader was arrested, tried for treason, and sentenced to imprisonment for life, June 25, 1844. In 1847 he was released under an act of general amnesty, and in 1851 was restored to civil and political rights. He died in 1854.

Dostoyevsky (dŏs'-tŏ-yĕf'-skē), Feodor Mikhailovitch, Russian novelist, was born at Moscow in 1822. His Poor Folk had not long appeared when he became involved in communist plots, and in 1849 was condemned to twelve years' labor in the Siberian mines. In 1856 he was permitted to return, and in 1860 published Prison Life in Siberia. His masterpiece, Crime and Punishment, is one of the most powerful realistic works of modern fiction. Other novels that have appeared in English are Injury and Insult, The Idiot, Friend of the Family, and The Gambler. He died in 1881.

Douglas, Stephen Arnold, American statesman, styled the "little giant," was born at Brandon, Vermont, 1813. His early youth was one of poverty; but he managed to spend three years at the Canandaigua academy, having the study of law in view. In 1833 he went West and settled in Jacksonville, Ill., where he entered on the practice of law, and was soon chosen attorney-general of the state. He soon after was elected to the legislature, and in 1840 became secretary of state for Illinois. He was judge of the Illinois supreme court from 1841 to 1843, when he resigned, and was chosen to congress as a democrat, where he at once became recognized as one of the ablest men of his party. He was opposed to slavery, was strongly opposed to the celebrated Wilmot proviso, and argued in favor of states rights. Douglas was elected to the senate in 1847, and it was as a member of the senate that he introduced, in 1854, the Kansas-Nebraska bill, which provided that their own citizens should determine whether these territories should become free or slave states. In 1858 he was a candidate for the United States senate, and held a series of joint debates with Abraham Lincoln, his opponent. In 1860 the democratic party split into two divisions, one of which nominated Douglas for president, and the other John C. Breckenridge. Douglas was strongly opposed to secession, and delivered several addresses on the subject after the outbreak of the civil war. He died in 1861.

Douglas, William Lewis, manufacturer, ex-governor of Massachusetts, was born in Plymouth, Mass., 1845; educated at brief, irregular periods in public schools of Massachusetts; when five years old his father died; at age of seven he went to work for an uncle, who set him to pegging shoes, and except for a brief return to his mother when eleven years old, worked for his uncle eight years; worked in cotton mill at Plymouth at fifteen, and later in factory at Chiltonville, Mass.; afterward went to Hopkinton and South Braintree, Mass., where he learned bootmaking; at Brockton, 1876, began with small shop, from which he has built up a business with combined capacity of over 20,000 pairs of shoes daily, and owns seventy-eight retail shoe stores in large cities selling the "Douglas" shoe. Member of Massachusetts house of representatives, 1884-85, and of Massachusetts senate, 1887; mayor of Brockton, 1890; elected governor of Massachusetts, 1905. Delegate to democratic national conventions, 1884, 1892, 1896; delegate at large, 1904.

Douglass, Frederick, American orator, a mulatto slave, was born at Tuckahoe, near Easton, Maryland, in 1817. In 1838 he escaped from a Baltimore shipyard to the northern states, and changed his name from Lloyd or Bailey to Douglass. He lectured on slavery with great success during 1845–47 in Great Britain, where 150 pounds was collected to buy his freedom. In 1847 he started Frederick Douglass's Paper, a weekly abolition newspaper, at Rochester, New York. He became assistant secretary to the Santo Domingo commission, 1871, a presidential elector, 1872; United States marshal for the District of Columbia, 1876–81; recorder of deeds there, 1881–86; and United States minister to Hayti, 1889–91. He died at his home near Washington, 1895.

Dow, or Dou, Gerard, Dutch painter, was born at Leyden in 1613. He studied under Rembrandt, 1628–31, and at first mainly occupied himself with portraiture, but soon turned to genre. His 200 works, scattered over all the great European collections, include his own portrait, that of his wife, "The Poulterer's Shop," in the national gallery, London; and his celebrated "Dropsical Woman," with ten others, in the Louvre. He died in 1675.

Dow, Neal, temperance reformer, was born in Portland, Me., 1804, of Quaker parentage. In 1851, through his efforts while mayor of Portland, he secured the passage of what is called the "Maine law," which, under severe penalties, prohibited the sale of intoxicating liquors. In 1884 this provision was incorporated in the constitution of the state. He was twice chosen mayor of Portland, and during the civil war served as brigadier-general of volunteers, holding at different times three separate commands. He was twice wounded and once taken prisoner. He resigned from the army in 1864. In 1880 he was the candidate of the national prohibition party for president of the United States. Died, 1897.

Dowden (dou'-den), Edward, British critic and editor, professor of English literature, university of Dublin, 1867-1913, was born in Cork, 1843; graduate of Dublin university; M. A., LL. D., D. C. L., Litt. D. Clark lecturer in English literature, Trinity college, Cambridge, 1893–96; commissioner of national education, Ireland, 1896–1901. He wrote: Shakspere: His Mind and Art; Studies in Literature; Life of Shelley; The French Revolution and English Literature; A History of French Literature; Puritan and Anglican; Michel de Montaigne; edited Shelley's Poetical Works; Wordsworth's Poetical Works, etc. Died, 1913.

Doyle, Sir A. Conan, Scottish novelist and physician, was born in Edinburgh, 1859; educated at Stonyhurst and Edinburgh university. From 1882 until 1890 he practiced his profession at Southsea, writing all the while various short stories, some of which have been since published under the title of The Captain of the Polestar. After A Study in Scarlet, Micah Clarke, and The Sign of Four came The White Company, which led to the final abandonment of medicine for literature. The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes and The Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes formed a brilliant series of detective stories. In 1894 he wrote a short play, A Story of Waterloo, successfully produced by Sir Henry Irving. Then followed The Exploits of Brigadier Gerard; Rodney Stone; Uncle Bernac; The Tragedy of the Korosko; a volume of poems entitled Songs of Action; A Duet with an Occasional Chorus; The Hound of the Baskervilles; The Adventures of Gerard; Return of Sherlock Holmes; Sir Nigel; Through the Magic Door; The Fires of Fate: a Modern Morality Play; The Crime of the Congo; Songs of the Road; The Lost World; etc. He volunteered for service in the Transvaal war, and, in 1900, gave his medical services for some months in the hospitals there, and afterward published a history of the war, entitled The Great Boer War. Knighted in 1902.

Draco (drā'-kō), archon of Athens and celebrated lawgiver, lived in the last half of the seventh century. He first gave stability to the state by committing the laws to writing, and establishing the ephetæ, or court of appeal, 621 B. C.; he punished every transgressor of his laws with death, so that his code became unbearable, and was superseded by a milder code, instituted by Solon, who affixed the penalty of death to murder alone. Draco is said to have justified the severity of his code by maintaining that the smallest crime deserved death, and he knew no severer punishment for greater. It is said he was smothered to death in the theater by the hats and cloaks showered on him as a popular mark of honor.

Drake, Sir Francis, eminent English navigator, was born of obscure parentage in 1540, at Tavistock, England, and first served at sea under Sir John Hawkins, his relative. From 1570 to 1572 he made three expeditions, as commander, to the West Indies and the Spanish main, in the last of which he gained a large booty. He next fought with such bravery in Ireland, under Essex, that Sir Christopher Hatton introduced him to Queen Elizabeth. With five small vessels he sailed in 1577 to attack the Spaniards in the South seas. In this expedition he ravaged the Spanish settlements, coasted the North American shore as far as latitude forty-eight degrees north, and took possession of the country under the name of New Albion. He then returned home by the Moluccas and the cape, after a circumnavigation of nearly three years. Elizabeth dined on board his ship at Deptford, and knighted him in 1580. In 1585 he successfully attacked the Spaniards in the West Indies; in 1587 he destroyed many ships at Cadiz; and in 1588, as vice-admiral, he participated in the destruction of the armada. He died near Porto Bello in 1596.

Drake, Joseph Rodman, American poet, was born in New York in 1795; graduated from Columbia college, 1816, and became an intimate friend of Fitz-Greene Halleck. His poems The Culprit Fay and Address to the American Flag are the best of his productions. He died in New York in 1820.

Drake, Samuel Gardner, American antiquary and writer, was born in Pittsfield, N. H., 1798. He opened an antiquarian book-store in Boston in 1828, and wrote and published various works, including Indian Biography, History and Antiquities of Boston, Annals of Witchcraft in the United States, and Book of the Indians. Died, 1875.

He published, among other works, History of Alexander the Great, History of Hellenism, and History of Prussian Politics. The latter is called his most important work. Died, 1884.

Drummond, Hon. Sir George Alexander, Canadian legislator and financier, was born in 1829. He became a member of the upper house of the Dominion parliament in 1888, and chairman of the banking and commerce standing committee of the senate. He was also president of the bank of Montreal, vice-president of the Royal trust company, director of Canadian Pacific railway, and other companies. Died, 1910.

general of the state. He soon after was elected to the legislature, and in 1840 became secretary of state for Illinois. He was judge of the Illinois supreme court from 1841 to 1843, when he resigned, and was chosen to congress as a democrat, where he at once became recognized as one of the ablest men of his party. He was opposed to slavery, was strongly opposed to the celebrated Wilmot proviso, and argued in favor of states rights. Douglas was elected to the senate in 1847, and it was as a member of the senate that he introduced, in 1854, the Kansas-Nebraska bill, which provided that their own citizens should determine whether these territories should become free or slave states. In 1858 he was a candidate for the United States senate, and held a series of joint debates with Abraham Lincoln, his opponent. In 1860 the democratic party split into two divisions, one of which nominated Douglas for president, and the other John C. Breckenridge. Douglas was strongly opposed to secession, and delivered several addresses on the subject after the outbreak of the civil war. He died in 1861.

Douglas, William Lewis, manufacturer, ex-governor of Massachusetts, was born in Plymouth, Mass., 1845; educated at brief, irregular periods in public schools of Massachusetts; when five years old his father died; at age of seven he went to work for an uncle, who set him to pegging shoes, and except for a brief return to his mother when eleven years old, worked for his uncle eight years; worked in cotton mill at Plymouth at fifteen, and later in factory at Chiltonville, Mass.; afterward went to Hopkinton and South Braintree, Mass., where he learned bootmaking; at Brockton, 1876, began with small shop, from which he has built up a business with combined capacity of over 20,000 pairs of shoes daily, and owns seventy-eight retail shoe stores in large cities selling the "Douglas" shoe. Member of Massachusetts house of representatives, 1884-85, and of Massachusetts senate, 1887; mayor of Brockton, 1890; elected governor of Massachusetts, 1905. Delegate to democratic national conventions, 1884, 1892, 1896; delegate at large, 1904.

Douglass, Frederick, American orator, a mulatto slave, was born at Tuckahoe, near Easton, Maryland, in 1817. In 1838 he escaped from a Baltimore shipyard to the northern states, and changed his name from Lloyd or Bailey to Douglass. He lectured on slavery with great success during 1845–47 in Great Britain, where 150 pounds was collected to buy his freedom. In 1847 he started Frederick Douglass's Paper, a weekly abolition newspaper, at Rochester, New York. He became assistant secretary to the Santo Domingo commission, 1871, a presidential elector, 1872; United States marshal for the District of Columbia, 1876–81; recorder of deeds there, 1881–86; and United States minister to Hayti, 1889–91. He died at his home near Washington, 1895.

Dow, or Dou, Gerard, Dutch painter, was born at Leyden in 1613. He studied under Rembrandt, 1628–31, and at first mainly occupied himself with portraiture, but soon turned to genre. His 200 works, scattered over all the great European collections, include his own portrait, that of his wife, "The Poulterer's Shop," in the national gallery, London; and his celebrated "Dropsical Woman," with ten others, in the Louvre. He died in 1675.

Dow, Neal, temperance reformer, was born in Portland, Me., 1804, of Quaker parentage. In 1851, through his efforts while mayor of Portland, he secured the passage of what is called the "Maine law," which, under severe penalties, prohibited the sale of intoxicating liquors. In 1884 this provision was incorporated in the constitution of the state. He was twice chosen mayor of Portland, and during the civil war served as brigadier-general of volunteers, holding at different times three separate commands. He was twice wounded and once taken prisoner. He resigned from the army in 1864. In 1880 he was the candidate of the national prohibition party for president of the United States. Died, 1897.

Dowden (dou'-den), Edward, British critic and editor, professor of English literature, university of Dublin, 1867-1913, was born in Cork, 1843; graduate of Dublin university; M. A., LL. D., D. C. L., Litt. D. Clark lecturer in English literature, Trinity college, Cambridge, 1893–96; commissioner of national education, Ireland, 1896–1901. He wrote: Shakspere: His Mind and Art; Studies in Literature; Life of Shelley; The French Revolution and English Literature; A History of French Literature; Puritan and Anglican; Michel de Montaigne; edited Shelley's Poetical Works; Wordsworth's Poetical Works, etc. Died, 1913.

Doyle, Sir A. Conan, Scottish novelist and physician, was born in Edinburgh, 1859; educated at Stonyhurst and Edinburgh university. From 1882 until 1890 he practiced his profession at Southsea, writing all the while various short stories, some of which have been since published under the title of The Captain of the Polestar. After A Study in Scarlet, Micah Clarke, and The Sign of Four came The White Company, which led to the final abandonment of medicine for literature. The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes and The Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes formed a brilliant series of detective stories. In 1894 he wrote a short play, A Story of Waterloo, successfully produced by Sir Henry Irving. Then followed The Exploits of Brigadier Gerard; Rodney Stone; Uncle Bernac; The Tragedy of the Korosko; a volume of poems entitled Songs of Action; A Duet with an Occasional Chorus; The Hound of the Baskervilles; The Adventures of Gerard; Return of Sherlock Holmes; Sir Nigel; Through the Magic Door; The Fires of Fate: a Modern Morality Play; The Crime of the Congo; Songs of the Road; The Lost World; etc. He volunteered for service in the Transvaal war, and, in 1900, gave his medical services for some months in the hospitals there, and afterward published a history of the war, entitled The Great Boer War. Knighted in 1902.

Draco (drā'-kō), archon of Athens and celebrated lawgiver, lived in the last half of the seventh century. He first gave stability to the state by committing the laws to writing, and establishing the ephetæ, or court of appeal, 621 B. C.; he punished every transgressor of his laws with death, so that his code became unbearable, and was superseded by a milder code, instituted by Solon, who affixed the penalty of death to murder alone. Draco is said to have justified the severity of his code by maintaining that the smallest crime deserved death, and he knew no severer punishment for greater. It is said he was smothered to death in the theater by the hats and cloaks showered on him as a popular mark of honor.

Drake, Sir Francis, eminent English navigator, was born of obscure parentage in 1540, at Tavistock, England, and first served at sea under Sir John Hawkins, his relative. From 1570 to 1572 he made three expeditions, as commander, to the West Indies and the Spanish main, in the last of which he gained a large booty. He next fought with such bravery in Ireland, under Essex, that Sir Christopher Hatton introduced him to Queen Elizabeth. With five small vessels he sailed in 1577 to attack the Spaniards in the South seas. In this expedition he ravaged the Spanish settlements, coasted the North American shore as far as latitude forty-eight degrees north, and took possession of the country under the name of New Albion. He then returned home by the Moluccas and the cape, after a circumnavigation of nearly three years. Elizabeth dined on board his ship at Deptford, and knighted him in 1580. In 1585 he successfully attacked the Spaniards in the West Indies; in 1587 he destroyed many ships at Cadiz; and in 1588, as vice-admiral, he participated in the destruction of the armada. He died near Porto Bello in 1596.

Drake, Joseph Rodman, American poet, was born in New York in 1795; graduated from Columbia college, 1816, and became an intimate friend of Fitz-Greene Halleck. His poems The Culprit Fay and Address to the American Flag are the best of his productions. He died in New York in 1820.

Drake, Samuel Gardner, American antiquary and writer, was born in Pittsfield, N. H., 1798. Drummond, Sir George Gordon, British soldier, was born in 1772, died in 1854. He entered the British army as ensign, 1789; served with distinction in the Holland campaign, 1794-95, and in Egypt, 1800; on duty in Canada, 1808–11; promoted to lieutenant-general, 1811; again ordered to Canada as second in command under Sir George Prevost, 1813; planned and effected the capture of Fort Niagara, and planned the successful attack on Black Rock and Buffalo; led a combined military and naval force against Oswego and destroyed the American works and stores, 1814; was in command of the British forces at the battle of Lundy's Lane, July 25, and in August invested, but failed to capture Fort Erie. In 1815 he was appointed governor-general of Canada, resigned and returned to England.

Drummond, Henry, Scottish clergyman and author, was born in Stirling, Scotland, 1851; educated at Edinburgh and Tübingen; studied for the Free church; lectured on natural science; became famous by the publication of Natural Law in the Spiritual World, a book which had an enormous sale. This was succeeded by Tropical Africa, a book of travel, and by a series of booklets, commencing with The Greatest Thing in the World, intended to expound and commend the first principles of the Christian faith. His last work except one, published posthumously, entitled The Ideal Life, was The Ascent of Man, in which he places an altruistic element in the process of evolution, and makes the goal of it a higher and higher life. Died, 1897.

Drummond, James, British biblical scholar, principal of Manchester college, Oxford, 1885–1906, was born in Dublin, 1835. He was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, and Manchester New College, London; LL. D., Litt. D., Dublin; M. A., Oxford; D. D., Tufts. Colleague of Rev. William Gaskell, Cross Street chapel, Manchester, 1859–69; professor of theology in Manchester New college, London, 1870; succeeded Dr. Martineau as principal, 1885; removed with the college to Oxford, 1889; retired, 1906. Author: Spiritual Religion: Sermons on Christian Faith and Life; The Jewish Messiah: A Critical History of the Messianic Idea Among the Jews; Introduction to the Study of Theology; Via, Veritas, Vita, the Hibbert lectures for 1894 on Christianity in its most simple and intelligible form; Studies in Christian Doctrine, etc.

Drusus (drōō'-sŭs), Nero Claudius, commonly called Drusus Senior, stepson of the emperor Augustus, and younger brother of the emperor Tiberius, was born in 38 B. C. As he grew up, he developed splendid personal qualities as well as the highest capacity for civil and military affairs. He began his public career in 19 B. C., and signalized himself by the defeat of the Rhætians and other Alpine tribes which infested the north of Italy. In 13 B. C. he was sent into Gaul, then in revolt, and, after crushing the rebels there, pushed across the Rhine in pursuit of their German allies. In this campaign he subdued the Sicambri and Frisii, and forced his way to the German ocean, being the first Roman general who had done so. From this time he made the business of his life to establish the Roman supremacy in Germany, partly by conquest, and partly by the execution of great military works. A fall from his horse cut short his brilliant career in 9 B. C.

Dryden, John, English poet, was born in Northamptonshire, 1631. After graduating at Cambridge, he entered upon a literary career, and succeeded Sir William Davenant as poet laureate in 1670. His essay on Dramatic Poesy, according to Dr. Johnson, created the school of English criticism. Dryden, by his dramas and political satires — especially his Absalom and Achitophel — occupies a high place among English poets, and his works have elicited high eulogy from such judges as Pope, Scott, Macaulay, and Brougham. He made numerous translations from the classics — especially Virgil, Juvenal, and Ovid — and his dramatic work almost equals his verse. Died, 1700.

Du Barry (dū bä'-rē'), Marie Jeanne Gomard de Vaubernier, Comtesse, favorite of Louis XV., was born in 1746, at Vaucouleurs, the daughter of a dressmaker. Brought up in a Paris convent, in 1769 as Mademoiselle Lange she won the notice of Louis XV., who married her to Comte Guillaume du Barry, brother of her former protector. Her influence henceforth reigned supreme until the death of Louis in 1774, when she was dismissed from court. She was tried before the revolutionary tribunal for having wasted the treasures of the state and worn mourning for the late king, and was guillotined, 1793.

Du Bois-Reymond (dū bwä'-rā'-môɴ'), Emil, German physiologist, was born in Berlin in 1818. His name is chiefly identified with animal electricity, the subject of his chief work, which has given him a commanding place among modern scientists. He became professor of physiology in the university of Berlin in 1858, and secretary of the Berlin academy of sciences in 1867. Two volumes of his collected memoirs and addresses appeared in 1885–87. Died, 1896.

Du Bose, William Porcher, Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in South Carolina, 1836. He was educated at the military academy of South Carolina and the university of Virginia; S. T. D., Columbia; D. C. L., university of the South; D. D., General theological seminary. While a student for the ministry he entered the military service of the confederacy, 1861; served as an officer through war, was several times wounded and once a prisoner; priest in the Protestant Episcopal church, 1865; became chaplain and professor, university of the South, 1871; after continuous service in this university for over thirty-six years, he resigned active duties in the summer of 1908 and was elected dean and professor emeritus. Du Chaillu (dū shä'-yū'), Paul Belloni, American traveler, was born in Louisiana, 1835. In 1855 he sailed to West Africa, where he spent four years. His Explorations in Equatorial Africa gave important contributions to geographical, ethnological, and zoölogical science, but was received at first with much distrust. In 1863–65 he revisited his old hunting grounds, vindicated his former discoveries, and described his second expedition in A Journey to Ashango-Land. Besides books for the young, founded on his varied adventures, he published The Land of the Midnight Sun and The Viking Age. Died, 1903.

Dudevant (dūd'-väɴ'), Aurore. See Sand, George.

Dufferin (dŭf'-ẽr-ĭn), Frederick Temple Hamilton Blackwood, Marquis of, British statesman, was born in Florence, Italy, 1826. He graduated from Christ Church, Oxford, and in 1841 succeeded to his father's title. In 1855 he was attached to the Vienna mission under Lord John Russell, and in 1859 made a yacht voyage to Iceland. In 1860 he gave a printed account of this voyage in Letters from High Latitudes. In 1860 he became British commissioner in Syria, and served as under-secretary of state for India from 1864 until 1866, and later, for a short time, was under-secretary of war. From 1868 until 1872 he was chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster; governor-general of Canada, 1872–78; ambassador to Russia, 1879–81; ambassador to Constantinople, 1881–84; governor-general of India, 1884–88; ambassador to Italy, 1888–91; and ambassador to France, 1891–96. He was made an earl in 1871. Author: Irish Emigration and the Tenure of Land in Ireland; Mr. Mill's Plan for the Pacification of Ireland Examined; Contributions to an Inquiry into the State of Ireland; Speeches and Addresses; etc. Died, 1902.

Du Guesclin (dü gĕ'-klăN'), Bertrand. See Guesclin.

Dumas (dü'-mä'), Alexandre, the Elder, French novelist and dramatist, was born in Villers-Cotterets, 1802, son of General Dumas, a Creole. He lost his father at the age of four, and led for a time a desultory life, until, driven by poverty, he went to Paris to seek his fortune. He soon made his mark in literature, and became the most popular dramatist and romancer of his time. His romances are numerous, but he reached the climax of his fame in Monte Cristo, in 1844, and the Three Musketeers, which followed soon after. He was unhappy in his marriage, and squandered his fortune in reckless extravagance. Latterly he lived at Dieppe, broken in health and impaired in intellect, ministered to by his son and daughter. Died, 1870.

Dumas, Alexandre, the Younger, was born in 1824. He was a son of the preceding, and, like him, a novelist and dramatist. He accompanied his father on a voyage to the Mediterranean in 1846, and in 1848 produced the work which made his reputation — La Dame aux Camélias — a novel which drew the encomium of his own father. Subsequently his work was chiefly dramatic, and includes such plays as Le Demi-Monde, La Princesse Georges, Monsieur Alphonse, and Denise. In 1874 he was admitted as a member to the French academy. Died, 1895.

Dumas, Jean Baptiste, distinguished French chemist, was born at Alais, in the department of Gard, 1800. He was at first apprenticed to an apothecary in Geneva, and engaged in some scientific investigations that attracted the attention of De Candolle and Prévost. In 1821 he went to Paris and became tutor in the polytechnic school, and then professor of chemistry in the École de Medicine. He was afterward removed to the Sorbonne and made a member of the institute. His researches in organic chemistry, on atomic weights, sulphuric ether, and the law of "substitutions" attracted the attention of all Europe. In 1848 he was a member of the legislative assembly; and in 1849–51 held the portfolio of agriculture and commerce. After the coup d'état he was made a member of the senate, and of the superior council of public instruction. Died, 1884.

Du Maurier (dü mō'-ryā'), George Louis Palmella Busson, artist and draughtsman, was born in Paris in 1834; educated in London, Belgium, and the Netherlands. For many years a valuable art contributor to Punch, at the same time illustrating many other books and magazines. His mode of satirizing the extravagances of the so-called æsthetic school and other society foibles procured for him a high reputation. In 1891 he published a novel, Peter Ibbetson, followed by Trilby in 1894. Died, 1896.

Dumourlez (dü'-mŏŏ'-ryā'), Charles François, French general, was born at Cambrai, 1739; entered the army in 1757, and served in Germany during the seven years' war. During the French revolution he became lieutenant-general in the army of the north, commanded by Marechal Luckner. A winter campaign in Belgium followed, and in 1792 he overthrew the Austrians under the duke of Sachsen-Teschen and Clairfait at Jemappes. The campaign of 1793, which aimed at the complete conquest of the Netherlands, was opened with the siege of Maestricht; Breda and other places were taken by the French; but at Neerwinden he sustained a severe defeat from the Austrians under Coburg, with whom he entered into a plot to restore the monarchy. Reports of his meditated treason, however, reached the government at Paris, and an order of arrest was issued against him. This he succeeded in evading, and escaped across the border. A reward of 300,000 francs was set upon his head, but after wandering through many countries of Europe he finally settled in England, where he died an exile at Turville Park, near Henley-upon-Thames, 1823.

Duncker (dŏŏng'-kĕr), Maximilian Wolfgang, German historical writer, was born at Berlin, 1811. He became professor of history at Halle in 1842; sat in the national assembly, 1848, and as a liberal in the Prussian chamber, 1849–52; was called to a Tübingen chair in 1857, and thence recalled in 1859 to Berlin to fill a post in the ministry of state. From 1867 to 1874 he was director of the state archives of Prussia. His greatest work is his History of Antiquity, though in 1883–86 he published the translation of an admirable history of Greece to the end of the Persian war. Died, 1886.

Dundonald (dŭn-dŏn'-ald), Thomas Cochrane, tenth Earl of, English seaman, was born in 1775. Entering the navy when a boy, he early distinguished himself by the destruction of the French fleet in Basque roads by fireships, 1809. In 1814 he was accused of complicity in originating a false report of Napoleon's death, and was imprisoned and expelled from the navy. He was commander-in-chief of the Chilian navy, 1818–22; secured the independence of Chili, and, in 1823, having offered his services to Brazil in her war against Portugal, he swept the Portuguese fleet from Brazilian waters. In 1827 he commanded the Greek navy in the war of independence. After the accession of Queen Victoria he was restored to his full rank and honors in the English navy. He died in 1860.

Dunglison (dŭng'-glĭ-sŭn), Robley, medical professor and author, was born in England in 1798. He studied medicine in London and Erlangen, Germany; received his degree at the latter university, 1823, and was appointed professor of medicine in the university of Virginia, 1824. He served there until 1833; was professor of materia medica and therapeutics in the university of Maryland, 1833–36, and of the institutes of medicine in Jefferson medical college, Philadelphia, 1836–68. He translated and edited a number of foreign medical works, published about twenty original volumes, among which were his well-known Medical Dictionary and Therapeutics and Materia Medica. Died, 1869.

Dunne (dŭn), Finley Peter, journalist, author, was born in Chicago, 1867; educated in Chicago public schools; entered newspaper life as reporter in 1885; served on various papers; on editorial staff of Chicago Evening Post and Times-Herald, 1892–97; editor of Chicago Journal, 1897–1900. Author: Mr. Dooley in Peace and in War; Mr. Dooley in the Hearts of His Countrymen; Mr. Dooley's Philosophy; Mr. Dooley's Opinions; Observations by Mr. Dooley; etc.

Dunning, William Archibald, historian, educator, professor of history, Columbia university, since 1891, was born in Plainfield, N. J.; graduated from Columbia, Ph. D., LL. D.; was managing editor of Political Science Quarterly, 1894–1903. Author: Essays on the Civil War and the Reconstruction; History of Political Theories; Reconstruction, Political and Economic; etc.

Dunois (dü'-nwä'), Jean, Count of Dunois and Longueville, was born in Paris, 1402, the natural son of Louis, duke of Orleans, brother of Charles VI. His first great achievement was the defeat of the English at Montargis, 1427; next he threw himself into Orleans with a small force, and defended it until its relief by Joan of Arc forced the English to raise the siege. In 1429 Dunois and the maid of Orleans won the battle of Patay, after which he marched through the provinces overrun by the English, and took the fortified towns. Shortly after Joan's tragical death, Dunois took Chartres, the key of Paris, forced Bedford to raise the siege of Lagny, chased the enemy from Paris, and soon deprived them of all their conquests except Normandy and Guienne. In 1448–50 he drove them from Normandy, and in 1455 from Guienne also, and secured the freedom of France. For joining the league of the nobles against Louis XI. he was deprived of all his possessions, which were, however, restored to him in 1465. He died in 1468. No French hero is more popular than Dunois.

Duns Scotus (dŭnz skō'-tŭs), John, famous Franciscan monk and divine, was born about 1265. He appears to have been educated at Oxford, where in 1301 he became professor of theology. He afterward removed to Paris, and then to Cologne, where he died in 1308. Duns Scotus, as one of the most eminent of the Franciscans, was a chief opponent of the teachings of the Dominicans, the two parties representing at that time two different schools of theology. He was also a chief advocate of realism, as opposed to nominalism. His writings occupy many volumes.

Dunstan (dŭn'-stan), Saint, English prelate, was born in 925, died in 988. Under several kings he wielded great influence. He was made archbishop of Canterbury in 959 by Edgar, whom he absolutely ruled. On Edgar's death he raised Edward to the throne, but on the accession of Ethelred his power was broken. Dunstan built up the power of the church, introduced the Benedictines, and meted out justice with a stern hand.

Du Pont, Henry Algernon, United States senator, soldier, was born near Wilmington, Del., 1838; graduated at West Point, 1861, at head of class, and served throughout the civil war, in which he gained the rank of colonel. He resigned from the army in 1875, and was president and general manager of the Wilmington and Northern railroad company, 1879–99. Engaged chiefly in agricultural pursuits since his retirement from business, 1902. Elected United States senator, 1906, for the term 1906–11; reëlected, 1911.

Dupont, Samuel Francis, American rear-admiral, was born at Bergen Point, N. J., 1803. In the summer of 1861 he was given command of the Atlantic blockading squadron. He also commanded the expedition which captured Port Royal harbor in the same year. He was made rear-admiral in 1862, and the next year commanded the fleet of ironclads which attacked Charleston, S. C., where he was defeated. He resigned his command in 1863, and died at Philadelphia in 1865.

Dupré (dü'-prā'), Jules, celebrated French painter, was born in 1812. He excels as a landscape painter, and his work is noted for its refined poetic taste as well as for its bold and vigorous drawing. Many of his pictures are owned in the United States. He died in 1889.

Duquesne (dü'-kān'), Abraham, Marquis, French naval officer, was born at Dieppe, France, 1610, and first distinguished himself in 1637–43 in the war with Spain. In the Swedish service he rose to vice-admiral; and then, returning to France, reduced Bordeaux, which had declared for the Fronde. He defeated De Ruyter and Van Tromp several times in 1672-73, and the united fleets of Spain and Holland off Sicily in 1676. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes, Duquesne was the only Protestant excepted. Died, 1688.

Dürer (dü'-rĕr), Albrecht, German artist, was born at Nuremberg in 1471. He was apprenticed to a painter in his native town, and some years later began designing on wood and engraving on copper. In 1505 he proceeded to Venice, and after his return painted his "Adam and Eve," and "Assumption of the Virgin," one of his finest works. He was much employed by the emperor Maximilian I. In 1520 he went to the Netherlands and painted the portrait of Erasmus, and while there he was appointed court painter by Charles V. He died at Nuremberg in 1528. Besides being the founder of the German school of art, Dürer ranks even higher as an engraver on metal and designer of woodcuts.

Duse (dōō'-zä), Elenora, Italian actress, was born in Vigevano, 1861. She appeared about 1880 on the Italian, chiefly the Roman stage, as leading lady in the plays of Dumas and Sardou, but afterward played parts of greater depth. She earned high praise by her combined force and gracefulness. In 1892 she appeared at Vienna and Berlin; in 1893 at New York, and more recently in England, she reaffirmed her triumphs. Although she appears chiefly in tragedy, her versatility has also allowed her to please in the lighter vein of Dumas' Francillon, and as the hostess in Goldoni's Locandiera. Her latest successes are D'Annunzio's Gioconda and Francesca da Rimini.

Dvorák (dvôr'-zhäk), Antonin, composer, was born at Mühlhausen, Bohemia, 1841. In 1873, after years of hack work, he composed a hymn which attracted attention. Brahms introduced his compositions to Vienna; but the work which won for him the ear of all Europe was his Stabat Mater, which was first performed in London in 1883. His most ambitious work is orchestral and choral — a cantata, the Spectre's Bride, an oratoria, St. Ludmilla, and several operas — none of them really successful. In 1892–95 he was director of the conservatory at New York, where he wrote an American symphony. He subsequently lived at Prague, where he died in 1904.

Dwight, Theodore William, jurist, professor, and editor, was born in 1822 at Catskill, N. Y.; graduated at Hamilton college, 1840, and studied at Yale law school. In 1846 he was elected Maynard professor of law in Hamilton college, and there established a law school. In 1858 he was chosen professor of municipal law in Columbia college. He published an Argument in the Rose Will Case, and other arguments in leading law cases, and edited Maine's Ancient Law. In 1874 he was appointed by Governor Dix, of New York, a judge of the commission of appeals. Died, 1892.

Dwight, Timothy, educator, theologian, was born at Northampton, Mass., 1752; graduated from Yale college. He was minister of Greenfield Hill, Conn., 1783, where he also successfully conducted an academy. In 1795 he was elected president of Yale college, which position he held until his death. His principal works are his Theology Explained and Defended, The Conquest of Canaan, an ambitious epic poem, and Travels in New England and New York. Died, 1817.

Dwight, Timothy, educator, theologian, was born at Norwich, Conn., 1828; grandson of the above; graduated from Yale, 1849; D. D., LL. D.; studied theology at Yale, 1850–53; tutor at Yale, 1851–55; studied at Bonn and Berlin, 1856–58; professor of sacred literature and new testament Greek, Yale theological seminary, 1858–86; president of Yale university, 1886–99.

He was a major of Virginia volunteers during the Mexican war. At the opening of the civil war he was appointed a colonel in the confederate army; commanded a brigade at Bull Run and Williamsburg, 1862; was promoted brigadier-general, 1863; commanded a division at Fredericksburg and Gettysburg; sent a body of cavalry into Pennsylvania which burned Chambersburg; was defeated by Sheridan near Winchester and at Fisher's Hill, Va., 1864, and was completely routed by General Custer at Waynesborough, 1865, after which he was relieved of his command. He subsequently practiced law in Richmond, and published A Memoir of the Last Year of the War for Independence in the Confederate States. Died, 1894.

East, Alfred, English landscape painter and etcher, was born at Kettering, 1849. He received his art education at the government school of art, Glasgow, afterward at École des Beaux Arts; also studied under Fleury and Bouguereau, Paris; has exhibited at the royal academy since 1882, and became an associate in 1899; is now president of the royal society of British artists. Among his chief works are "Returning from Church," Carnegie art gallery, Pittsburgh, Pa.; "A Passing Storm," Luxembourg, Paris; "London at Night," Milan national gallery; "Gibraltar from Algeciras," Liverpool. Author: The Art of Landscape Painting in Oil Colour.

Eastlake, Sir Charles Lock, English painter, was born at Plymouth, 1793. From 1809 he studied under Haydon, in the royal academy schools, and in Paris. When the Bellerophon put into Plymouth, Eastlake took a number of rapid sketches from a shore-boat, and produced two full-length portraits of Napoleon. From 1816 to 1830 he lived in Rome, executing banditti pictures, "Pilgrims in Sight of Rome," etc. In 1839 appeared "Christ Blessing Little Children," now in the national gallery, London. He was knighted in 1850, and in 1855 was appointed director of the national gallery. He died at Pisa, 1865.

Eastman, George, inventor, was born in Waterville, N. Y., 1854; was educated in Rochester, New York, and first became an amateur photographer. He subsequently carried on a series of experiments in photography and perfected a process for making dry plates; began to manufacture dry plates on small scale, 1880; inventor of the kodak, and entered extensively into its manufacture; now treasurer and general manager of Eastman kodak company, Rochester, N. Y.; managing director of Kodak company, London, England; president of Eastman kodak company of New Jersey, etc.

Eaton, Arthur Wentworth Hamilton, Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Kentville, Nova Scotia; graduated from Harvard, 1880; D. C. L., King's university, Nova Scotia, 1905. Ordained deacon, 1884, priest, 1885, in New York; priest in charge of parish, Chestnut Hill, Mass., 1885-86. Eaton, Wyatt, American artist, was born at Phillipsburg, Canada, 1849. He studied in New York, and in Paris with Gérôme. After spending some years in study, sketching and traveling in France and England, he opened a studio in New York; was one of the founders and the first secretary of the society of American artists, and achieved success as a portrait and figure landscape painter. Among his paintings are: "Farmer's Boy"; "Reverie"; "Harvesters at Rest"; "Boy Whittling"; "Portrait of William Cullen Bryant"; and "Grandmother and Child." Died at Newport, R. I., 1896.

Ebers (ā′-bĕrs), Georg Moritz, German novelist and Egyptologist, was born at Berlin, 1837; studied jurisprudence at Göttingen, and oriental languages and archæology at Berlin. In 1870 he was made professor of Egyptology at Leipzig. His most important works are: Egypt and the Books of Moses; Through Goshen to Sinai; the famous novel Uarda; An Egyptian Princess; Homo Sum; The Burgomaster's Wife; and The Emperor. He died at Tutzing, Bavaria, 1898.

Ebner-Eschenbach (āb′-nẽr-ĕsh′-en-băᴋ), Marie, Baroness von, Austrian novelist and poet, was born in Moravia, 1830. Since 1848 she has lived principally in Vienna. Her first publications, a drama and some comedies, are now unimportant. Her fame rests on her prose fiction, which was begun in Erzählungen in 1875, and continued in Lotti, die Uhrmacherin, Alte Schule, Agave, and Die arme Kleine. She also wrote a popular collection of Aphorismen, and Parabeln, Märchen und Gedichte. She is the foremost German woman writer of the day, possessing remarkable power of description, keen humor, and polished precision of style. Her novels are especially notable for their psychological insight, and for the exact sense of proportion shown in their construction.

Eck (ĕk), Johann Maier von, German monk and theologian, was born at Eck, in Swabia, 1486. He was the son of a peasant, but raised himself by his abilities to the professorship of theology in the university of Ingolstadt. He took a prominent part in opposition to Luther in the diet at Augsburg, 1530, and in the conferences of Worms and Ratisbon, 1540 and 1541. The name of Lutherans, which was at first given to the party of the reformation as a nickname, was given to them by Eck. Died, 1543.

Eckermann (ĕk′-ẽr-măn), Johann Peter, German writer and literary executor of Goethe, was born in Winsen, Germany, 1792. After serving in the war of 1813-14, he was employed in the war office at Hanover, and studied at Göttingen. The publication of his Beiträge zur Poesie in 1823 led to his removal to Weimar, where he assisted Goethe in preparing the final edition of his works. He has won for himself a lasting name by his invaluable Conversations with Goethe. Died, 1854.

Eddy, Mary Baker Glover, religious leader, founder of Christian Science, was born in Bow, N. H., 1821. She received her education in public schools, in an academy, and under private tutors. She was connected with the Congregational church until 1866, when she discovered what are known as the principles of Christian Science. In 1867 she began to teach them, and in 1879 founded the church of Christ in Boston, Mass. In 1881 she was ordained to the ministry; in the same year established the Massachusetts metaphysical college in Boston; and in 1883 started the Christian Science Journal. She is the author of Science and Health, With Key to the Scriptures, the Christian Science text-book; Unity of Good; No and Yes; Rudimental Divine Science; Manual of the Mother Church, and other works on related subjects. In 1907 she was decorated by the French government as an officier d'académie. In 1908, after a residence of nineteen years, she removed from Concord, N. H., to Brookline, Mass. Mrs. Eddy left her entire fortune to the Christian Science Church, specifying that $100,000 be used for the benefit of indigent, educated, well-qualified persons who desire to enter the Christian Science work, while the residue of her fortune is to be used by the Church for furthering the Christian Science movement. Died, 1910.

Edeson, Robert, actor, was born at New Orleans, La., 1868. He was educated in the public schools at Brooklyn, N. Y., and made his first appearance on the stage in Fascination at the Park theater, New York, 1887. Later he appeared in A Night Off, The Dark Secret, Incog., and Under the Red Robe. He has also starred in The Climbers, Soldiers of Fortune, Strongheart, and Classmates, and ranks among the leading American members of his profession.

Edgeworth, Maria, English novelist, was born at Oxfordshire, 1767. She began to write fiction early in the nineteenth century, though she had previously taken an interest in educational topics. Her chief books, which treat mainly of the virtues and vices of humanity with a high moral aim, embrace Popular Tales; Moral Tales; Castle Rackrent; Belinda Ormond; Tales of Fashionable Life, with an Essay on Irish Bulls. Died in Ireland, 1849.

Edison, Thomas Alva, celebrated American inventor and electrician, was born at Milan, Ohio, 1847; received some instruction from his mother; at twelve years of age he became newsboy on Grand Trunk railway; later learned telegraphy; worked as operator at various places in United States and Canada; invented many telegraphic appliances, including automatic repeater, quadruplex telegraph, printing telegraph, etc. Established workshop at Newark, N. J., removing to Menlo Park, N. J., 1876, and later to West Orange, N. J. Invented machines for quadruplex and sextuplex telegraphic transmission; the carbon telegraph transmitter; the microtasimeter for detection of small changes in temperature; the megaphone, to magnify sound; the phonograph; the aërophone; the incandescent lamp and light system; the kinetoscope; also scores of other inventions. Was made chevalier, officer, and afterward commander of legion of honor, by French government; was given the honorary degree of Ph. D. by Union university, 1878, and has been variously honored by numerous scientific, educational, and other bodies; appointed, 1903, honorary chief consulting engineer of Louisiana Purchase exposition, St. Louis. He invented a talking moving picture machine, 1912.

Edmund, or Eadmund, king of the English, known as Ironside, was born about 981. He was the son of Ethelred "the unready," and was chosen king by the Londoners on his father's death, 1016, while Canute was elected at Southampton by the witan. Edmund hastily levied an army in the West, defeated Canute twice, raised the siege of London, and again routed the Danes. Levying a fresh army, he defeated them at Otford — his last victory. At Assandun in Essex, after a desperate fight, he was routed. By a compromise with Canute, the latter retained Mercia and Northumbria, Edmund all the South and the headship, the survivor to succeed to the whole. A few weeks later Edmund died, 1016.

Edmunds, George Franklin, American lawyer and statesman, was born at Richmond, Vt., 1828; received a public school education, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began practicing when twenty-one years old; removed to Burlington, 1851; was a member of the state legislature, 1854–59, and its speaker three years; took his seat in the United States senate as a republican from Vermont, 1866. He was returned 1869, 1875, 1881, and 1887, and succeeded Vice-president Arthur as president pro tem. of the senate after the death of President Garfield, 1881. He was chairman of the senate committee that acted in conjunction with one of the house in drafting the bill creating the electoral commission of 1877, and was a member of that body; was author of the act to suppress polygamy and disfranchise those who practiced it, 1882; declined the appointment of associate justice of the United States supreme court, 1882; elected president pro tem. of the senate, 1883, and was author of the act prescribing the manner in which electoral votes for president shall be counted, 1886. He resigned the senatorship in 1891, and has since practiced law in Philadelphia.

Edward, or Eadward, "the confessor," king of the English, was born about 1004, son of Ethelred "the unready" and Emma, daughter of Richard "the fearless," duke of Normandy; was brought up at the Norman court, and after his accession, on the death of Hardicanute, in 1042, showed a preference for Norman customs and ideas. Outrages were committed with impunity by his Norman favorites, while the English earls, Leofric of Mercia, and Godwine of Wessex, were engaged in private quarrels. At last, in 1052, Godwine, who had been outlawed, rose in rebellion, installed Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury, in place of Robert of Jumieges, who had fled with the other Normans, and during the rest of the reign all real power was in the hands of the house of Godwine. Edward codified the customary law of the Anglo-Saxons, which thus became known as the "laws of King Edward." Died, 1066.

Edward I., king of England, was born in 1239, succeeded his father, Henry III., in 1272. Imbued with high notions of feudal sovereignty, he sought to establish his supremacy throughout the island of Britain. His expeditions against Llewellyn-ap-Gruffydd, prince of Wales, 1282, and his brother, David, 1283, resulted in the reduction of the principality, the government of which he settled by the statute of Wales, 1284. The struggle between John Baliol and Robert Bruce for the throne of Scotland gave him a pretext for interfering in that country, 1290. After vainly endeavoring to maintain Baliol as his vassal, he set to work to conquer Scotland for himself, sending the earl of Warrenne there as viceroy, but was forced to contend with a succession of claimants, and died near Carlisle, while marching against Robert Bruce. A man of strictly legal, but somewhat narrow mind, he secured order and good government by the statutes of Winchester and Westminster and other enactments, and carried on Simon de Montfort's work of molding the English parliament, 1295, though, at the same time, somewhat inclined to strain the royal prerogative. His personal character was extremely high. Died, 1307.

Edward II., king of England from 1307 to 1327, son of Edward I., was born at Carnarvon, 1284. In 1301 he was created prince of Wales, being the first heir apparent to the English throne who bore that title. In 1308 he went to France to conclude a marriage with Isabella, daughter of Philip "the fair," leaving the dissolute Piers de Gaveston in charge at home. The nobles rose against the latter, twice forced Gaveston to leave England, and after his return finally hanged him in 1312. Two years later Edward invaded Scotland with an immense army, but was encountered at Bannockburn on June 24, 1314, by Robert Bruce and defeated with great slaughter. The rest of his reign was a succession of disputes with the nobles and with Charles IV. of France. Finally his queen and the nobles revolted against him successfully in 1327, and Edward was murdered in Berkeley castle, having been deposed by parliament several months previous. He was succeeded by his son, who had already been named as Edward III. by parliament.

Edward III., king of England, eldest son of Edward II. and Isabella of France, was born in 1312. He was proclaimed king, 1327, during his father's captivity, and soon after marched with more than 40,000 men against the invading Scots, but concluded an inglorious campaign by a treaty in which the entire independence of Scotland was recognized. The war was subsequently renewed by Edward, who several times invaded Scotland in support of Edward Balliol's claims to the crown. As the son of Isabella, daughter of Charles IV., Edward claimed the crown of France against Philip of Valois. Having made foreign alliances, in 1338 he advanced into France with about 50,000 men, but returned without an engagement. Soon after he defeated a French fleet off Sluis, and at the head of nearly 200,000 men, including his Flemish allies, undertook the sieges of Tournay and St. Omer, both of which were unsuccessful. In 1346 Edward gained over Philip the decisive battle of Crécy, which was followed by the siege and surrender of Calais and a truce which lasted until 1355. While Calais was besieged, King David of Scotland invaded England, but was defeated and captured, and Edward retaliated by widely desolating Scotland. The war was renewed in France under his son Edward the Black Prince, who, in 1356, gained the memorable victory of Poitiers, in which he took King John of France prisoner. The Scottish king was ransomed for 100,000 pounds in 1357; and in 1360 the "great peace" was concluded at Bretigny, by which Edward renounced his pretensions to the crown of France and restored his conquests, retaining only the full sovereignty of Poitou, Guienne, and the county of Ponthieu. Edward was succeeded by his grandson Richard II. Died, 1377.

Edward IV., king of England, was born in Rouen in 1441 or 1442. He was the son of Richard, duke of York, led a force into London during the war of the Roses, 1461, and was proclaimed king by parliament while Henry VI. was still alive. In 1460 the Yorkists had gained a great victory at Northampton, and shortly after his accession Edward completely routed the Lancastrians in the bloody battle of Towton. In 1464 he married Lady Elizabeth Grey, which so displeased the earl of Warwick that he joined the Lancastrians and raised an army against Edward, who in 1470 fled to Holland. Henry VI. was restored to the throne, and Edward was pronounced a usurper. The latter returned with foreign aid, was greatly reënforced in England, defeated the Lancastrians at Barnet, April 14, 1471, where Warwick was slain, and remanded Henry to the Tower. The Lancastrian army, commanded by the duke of Somerset, was again defeated at Tewkesbury, May 4. Margaret, Henry's queen, was taken prisoner and held in captivity for five years, and her son, Prince Edward, was slain. Her husband perished in the Tower a few weeks after the battle. In 1474 Edward formed an alliance with the duke of Burgundy, and made preparations for a war in support of his claim to the throne of France. He passed over to Calais, but the expedition proved fruitless through the dereliction of his ally Charles the Bold of Burgundy, with whom the kingdom was to have been divided. Edward then became involved in a bitter strife with his brother Clarence, who was put to death in 1478 on a charge of treason for arraigning public justice. During the latter part of his life Edward was sunk in indolence and pleasure. He left five daughters, of whom Elizabeth was afterward married to Henry VII., and two sons, the ill-fated princes, Edward and Richard. Died, 1483.

Edward VI., king of England, son of Henry VIII. by his third wife, Jane Seymour, was born in 1537. He succeeded to the throne at his father's death in 1547, his uncle, the earl of Hertford, being chosen protector and created duke of Somerset. With the protector Edward shared the religious convictions of the reformation, and during his rule great strides were made toward the establishment of Protestantism in England; images were removed from the churches; the laity were admitted to the Lord's supper; Henry's famous six articles were repealed, and a new book of common prayer was issued. Edward became displeased with Somerset and had him executed in 1552. His place was taken by Dudley, the earl of Warwick, now created duke of Northumberland, who succeeded in getting Edward to nominate Lady Jane Grey as his successor shortly before he died in 1553. His reign was marked by the restoration of many of the grammar schools suppressed by Henry VIII.

Edward VII., king of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and emperor of India from 1901 to 1910, eldest son of Queen Victoria, was born at Buckingham palace, 1841. He studied at Edinburgh, and subsequently at Oxford and Cambridge. As prince of Wales he bore his full name, Albert Edward. In 1860 he visited the United States and Canada; in 1862 traveled with Dean Stanley in the East; and in 1863 married the princess Alexandra, eldest daughter of Christian IX. of Denmark. Besides three daughters, two sons were born of this marriage—the eldest, Prince Albert Victor, duke of Clarence, and Prince George of Wales. The king's recovery from a six weeks' attack of typhoid was celebrated in St. Paul's in 1872 with great enthusiasm. He made a visit to India in 1875-76. He constantly manifested a lively interest in exhibitions, charitable institutions, the housing of the poor, and agriculture; and for the queen, his mother, he as prince of Wales bore much of the burden of court ceremonials and public functions. He assisted in promoting the royal college of music; and the imperial institute was due to his suggestion. In 1900 he was shot at by a young anarchist, Sipido, in a train at Brussels. On January 22, 1901, he succeeded his mother as Edward VII. His coronation, fixed for June 26, 1902, had to be postponed on account of a severe surgical operation, but was carried out on August 9th. By visits to continental capitals the king did much to allay international animosities and promote peace and goodwill, especially between Britain and France. Died, 1910.

Edward, the Black Prince, eldest son of Edward III., was born in 1330, and was created earl of Chester, 1333, duke of Cornwall, 1337, and prince of Wales, 1343. In 1346, though only a boy, he fought at Crécy, and is said to have won from his black armor his popular title — a title first cited in the sixteenth century. In 1355-56 he undertook two marauding expeditions in France, the second signalized by the great victory of Poitiers. In 1361 he married his cousin, Joan, the "fair maid of Kent," who bore him two sons, Edward and the future Richard II.; in 1362 his father created him prince of Aquitaine, and next year he departed to take possession of his principality. In 1367 he espoused the cause of Pedro the Cruel, and at Navarrete won his third great victory, taking Du Guesclin prisoner; in 1370, worn out by sickness, he mercilessly sacked Limoges. He died, 1376.

Edwards, Amelia Blandford, British novelist and Egyptologist, was born in London, 1831. Her first novel, My Brother's Wife, 1855, was followed by a dozen others, among them Barbara's History, Debenham's Vow, and Lord Brackenbury. She also published a volume of Ballads, and, besides books of holiday travel in Belgium and the Dolomites, A Thousand Miles up the Nile, in 1877. Miss Edwards was the founder of the Egyptian exploration fund, and contributed papers on Egyptology to the principal European and American journals. She visited the United States in 1889, lectured at a number of places and received the degree of LL. D. from Columbia university. She died at Weston-super-Mare, 1892.

Edwards, Jonathan, celebrated American divine and metaphysician, was born at East Windsor, Conn., 1703. He was graduated from Yale in 1720, and toward the close of 1723 was appointed tutor in Yale college. In 1726 he accepted an invitation to become colleague to his maternal grandfather, Solomon Stoddard, in a church at Northampton, Mass., and was ordained in 1727. Here he labored with intense zeal for more than twenty-three years, at the end of which period he was dismissed by his congregation. The immediate cause of the rupture between him and his hearers was his insistence that no unconverted persons should be allowed to approach the Lord's table. Edwards was a powerful and impressive preacher, somber, and even gloomy in his religious opinions and sentiments, but earnest, unaffected, and nobly conscientious. During the famous revival of 1740-41 he was much sought after as a preacher, and is in fact often regarded as the originator of that movement. As early as 1734 a local manifestation of religious enthusiasm had taken place in his own parish, of which he published an account, entitled A Faithful Narrative of the Surprising Work of God in the Conversion of Many Hundred Souls in Northampton. After his dismissal in 1750 he became a missionary among the Indians of Massachusetts. While residing at Stockbridge, in that state, he composed his famous treatises on the Freedom of the Will, and Original Sin. In 1757 he was chosen president of Princeton college, New Jersey, but died in 1758.

Edwards, Julian, American composer, was born in Manchester, England, 1855. He studied music under Sir Herbert Oakeley, Edinburgh, and Sir George Macfarran, London; composed operettas played in British provinces, and became conductor of the Royal English opera company. He came to the United States in 1888. Among his compositions are the operas and musical pieces: Victorian; Elfinella; Corinne; Jupiter; Friend Fritz; King Rene's Daughter; Goddess of Truth; and Brian Boru. He is also author of Sunlight and Shadow, a song collection. Died, 1910.

Egan (ē'-gan), Maurice Francis, educator, author, diplomat, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., 1852; graduated at La Salle college; entered Georgetown college, 1875; LL. D., Georgetown, 1879; J. U. D., Ottawa university, 1891; was on the editorial staff of McGee's Illustrated Weekly, Catholic Review, and Freeman's Journal; professor of English literature, university of Notre Dame, Ind., 1888–95; and at Catholic university of America, 1895–1907. Author: A Garden of Roses; Stories of Duty; The Life Around Us; The Theater and Christian Parents; Modern Novelists; Lectures on English Literature; A Gentleman; Jack Chumleigh; Jack Chumleigh at Boarding School; A Primer of English Literature; The Disappearance of John Longworthy; A Marriage of Reason; The Success of Patrick Desmond; The Flower of the Flock; Preludes, poems; Songs and Sonnets, and other poems; The Chatelaine of the Roses; Jasper Thorne; In a Brazilian Forest; The Leopard of Lancianus; Studies in Literature; The Watson Girls; Belinda; Belinda's Cousins; The Sexton Maginnis Stories, etc. One of the editors of The World's Best Literature, Encyclopedia of Irish Literature, etc. In 1907, appointed United States minister to Denmark.

Eggleston (ĕg'-'lz-tŭn), Edward, American author, was born at Vevay, Ind., 1837. He became a Methodist preacher in 1856, and subsequently edited for various periods the New York Independent, Hearth and Home, etc. In 1879 he retired from the ministry, and devoted himself entirely to literature. Among his best known books are The Hoosier Schoolmaster; The Circuit Rider; Roxy; Pocahontas and Powhatan; The Graysons; and History of United States; The Beginners of a Nation, and The Transit of Civilization. Died, 1902.

duke of Guilders, was born in 1522. As commander of the Spanish cavalry of Charles V., he defeated the French, 1557–58, but incurring the enmity of Philip II., through his lenient treatment of the Flemish Protestants, he was put to death, 1568, despite the remonstrances of Queen Elizabeth of England, and German princes. His fate led to the independence of the Netherlands.

Eichelberger (*ī*ᴋ*'-el-bĕr*ᴋ*'-ẽr*), William Snyder, astronomer, was born in Baltimore, Md., 1865; graduated from Johns Hopkins, 1886; Ph. D., 1891. He became assistant in nautical almanac office, 1889-90, 1896–98; instructor in mathematics and astronomy, Wesleyan university, Conn., 1890–96; computor in United States naval observatory, 1898–1900; professor of mathematics, United States navy, since 1900; head of division of meridian instruments, United States naval observatory, 1902–07; member of United States eclipse expedition, Pinehurst, N. C., 1900; in charge of United States eclipse stations at Fort de Kock, Sumatra, 1901, and Daroca, Spain, 1905. Member of numerous scientific societies, and a frequent contributor of astronomical papers to government publications and astronomical journals.

Eichhorn (*ī*ᴋ*'-hôrn*), Johann Gottfried, German scholar, was born at Dörrenzimmern, Germany, 1752, and studied at Göttingen. He first became rector of the school of Ohrdruff, in the duchy of Gotha, afterward, in 1775, professor of oriental languages in the university of Jena, and in 1788 removed to Göttingen in the like capacity. Of this university he continued a distinguished ornament until his death in 1827. His scholarship was almost universal, and he left numerous treatises on a multitude of subjects, both ancient and modern, classical and oriental, but he is chiefly known in this country as a biblical critic, and a chief of what is called the rational school. His chief works are a Universal Library of Biblical Literature, an introduction to the old testament, an introduction to the new testament, and an introduction to the apocryphal writings of the old testament.

Eiffel (ĕ'-fĕl'), Gustave, French engineer, was born at Dijon, 1832, and early gained a reputation for bridge construction. In 1858 he constructed the iron bridge over the Garonne at Bordeaux, and was one of the first to utilize air-caissons. The bridge over the Douro at Oporto, the great viaduct of Garabit in Cantal, and that over the Tardes near Montluçon, were designed by him; while in the huge framework erected for Bartholdi's statue of Liberty may be seen the germ of the iron Eiffel tower, 984 feet high, erected in 1887–89, on the Champ-de-Mars in Paris, at a cost of 200,000 pounds. In 1893 he was condemned to two years' imprisonment and a fine of 20,000 francs for breach of trust in connection with the Panama canal works, but the sentence was annulled by the court of cassation.

Einhard (īn'-härt), or Eginhard (ā'-gĭn-härt), Frankish scholar and biographer of Charlemagne, was born at Maingau in East Franconia, about 770. He was sent to the court of Charlemagne, where he became a pupil of Alcuin and a favorite of the emperor. Louis, successor of Charlemagne, continued his father's favor. For years Einhard was lay abbot of various monasteries, but ultimately retired to Mühlheim. Here he died about 840, and was buried beside his wife, Emma, whom a baseless tradition makes a daughter of Charlemagne. His Vita Caroli Magni is the great biographical work of the middle ages.

Eldon, John Scott, Lord, celebrated English lawyer and jurist, was born at Newcastle, of humble parentage, 1751. He was educated at Oxford for the church, but got into difficulties through a runaway marriage. He then betook himself to law, rose rapidly in his profession, and, entering parliament, held important legal offices under Pitt; was made a baron, 1799, and lord chancellor, 1801, an office which he held for twenty-six years; retired from public life in 1835, and left a large fortune at his death; was noted for the shrewd equity of his judgments and his delay in delivering them. Died, 1838.

Eleanor of Aquitaine, queen of France and of England, was born about 1122, and died in 1204. She was so called because she was a daughter of the duke of Aquitaine. She first married Louis VII. of France, who divorced her in 1152, and she then married Henry II. of England. It was through her that the English kings claimed the duchy of Aquitaine. Henry's neglect turned her love to hatred, and she stirred up her sons to rebel against him, for which she was kept in prison about fifteen years. She afterward ruled England as regent when her son Richard I. went to the holy land, and when he was imprisoned in Germany she went there to carry his ransom. King John was also her son.

Elgin (ĕl'-gĭn) and Kincardine (kĭn-kär'-dĭn), James Bruce, Earl of, was born in London, 1811, and succeeded his father, the seventh earl, who in 1812 brought from Athens the Elgin marbles, and himself was first Baron Elgin in the United Kingdom peerage. As governor of Jamaica, 1842–46, and as governor-general of Canada, 1847–54, he displayed great administrative abilities. While on his way to China in 1857, as plenipotentiary, he heard at Singapore of the Indian mutiny, and diverted the Chinese expedition thither — thus delaying his own operations, which, after some military operations and diplomacy, issued in the treaty of Tientsin in 1858. He also negotiated a treaty with Japan, and on his return to England became postmaster-general. In 1860 he was again in China to enforce the treaty, and in 1861 became governor-general of India. He died, 1863.

Elijah, greatest of the prophets of Israel, was born at Tishbe, in Gilead, on the borders of the desert. He comes upon the scene in the same time of Ahab, in the ninth century B. C. When that monarch, to please his Phœnician wife, Jezebel, had introduced on an extensive scale the worship of Baal, Elijah pronounced a curse on the land. The prophet had to flee. He took refuge by the brook Cherith. Here he was miraculously fed by ravens. He then went to Zarephath, a town lying between Tyre and Sidon. Here he lodged with a widow, prolonged her oil and meal, and brought back her son to health from the brink of the grave. Subsequently he made a temporary reconciliation with Ahab, and on Mount Carmel executed dreadful vengeance on the prophets of Baal, slaying 400 with his own hand. After the death of Ahab he rebuked the idolatries of his son Ahaziah in a solemn fashion and also denounced the evil doings of his successor. The closing scene of his life on earth is vividly narrated. A chariot of fire and horses of fire appeared after Elisha and he had crossed the Jordan, and "Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven."

Eliot, Charles William, educator, ex-president of Harvard university, was born in 1834, and graduated from Harvard in 1853. He taught mathematics and chemistry at Harvard, and in 1863 went to Europe to study chemistry and to investigate the educational institutions of that continent. While at Vienna in 1865, he was chosen professor of analytical chemistry in the Massachusetts institute of technology, which post he filled for a period of four years and again went to Europe and spent fourteen months, mainly in France, in further investigation. In 1869 Dr. Eliot succeeded Dr. Thomas Hill as president of Harvard college, and continued at its head until 1909. During his administration many notable changes in the government of the college occurred, its scope was broadened and there was a great increase in the number of its professors and students, while its wealth by gifts and benefactions was greatly increased, so that now it more than successfully competes with the great European universities. Eliot was given the degree of LL. D. by Williams and Princeton colleges in 1869, by Yale in 1870, and by Johns Hopkins in 1902. He is also an officer of the legion of honor of France, and member of many scientific and literary bodies. Besides numerous addresses, chemical memoirs, and technical investigations, he published in conjunction with Professor F. H. Storer a Manual of Inorganic Chemistry, and a Manual of Qualitative Chemical Analysis. More recently he published American Contributions to Civilization; Educational Reform; Charles Eliot: Landscape Architect; More Money for the Public Schools; John Gilley; The Happy Life; and Four American Leaders.

Eliot, George, is the nom de plume of Mary Ann Evans, a distinguished English novelist, born at Arbury, in Warwickshire, 1819. She received a superior education, and became very proficient in Latin, German, and the higher mathematics. She began her literary career by a translation of Strauss's Life of Jesus, and became, in 1851, a contributor to the Westminster Review. During this time she formed the acquaintance of George Henry Lewes, with whom she ere long lived as his wife, though unmarried, and who, it would seem, discovered her latent faculty for fictional work. Her first work in that line was Scenes of Clerical Life, contributed to Blackwood's in 1857. The stories proved a signal success, and were followed by a series of seven novels, beginning in 1859 with Adam Bede, which attained an immense success, and at once secured for the writer almost undisputed rank with the most eminent novelists of the day. This was followed in 1860 by The Mill on the Floss, which amply sustained the high reputation of the writer; and in 1861 by Silas Marner, the Weaver of Raveloe, a tale in one volume, which, as to art, is perhaps the most perfect of any of this series of works. In 1861 the Scenes of Clerical Life was republished from Blackwood's Magazine, to meet with a renewal of the favor with which it was originally received. In 1863 Romola appeared; Felix Holt was published in 1866, and Middlemarch in 1872; Daniel Deronda and Impressions of Theophrastus Such appeared later. These, with two volumes of poems, make up her works. Lewes died in 1878, and two years after she formally married an old friend, John Cross, and after a few months of wedded life died of inflammation of the heart.

Eliot, John, the "Indian apostle," was born probably at Widford, Herts, England, in 1604; graduated from Jesus college, Cambridge, in 1622, and after taking orders quitted England for conscience' sake, and landed at Boston in 1631. Next year he settled at Roxbury, and in 1646 began to preach in the native dialect to the Indians at Nonantum, five miles off. He shortly after established his converts in regular settlements; and in England a corporation was founded in 1649 for propagating the gospel among the Indians of New England. In 1674 the number of "praying Indians" was estimated at 3600, but the decay of the "praying towns" was rapid after King Philip's war in 1675, in which the converts suffered equal cruelties at the hands of their countrymen and of the English. Eliot died at Roxbury in 1690. He assisted in preparing an English metrical version of the psalms, The Bay Psalm-Book, the first book printed in New England; but his greatest work was the translation of the Bible into the Indian tongue.

Elizabeth, queen of England from 1558 to 1603, was born at Greenwich in 1533. She was the daughter of Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn, and was scarcely three years of age when her mother was beheaded, and only thirteen at the death of her father. As Princess Elizabeth, she had the advantage of the best teachers and masters, especially under the supervision of Catharine Parr, the last of Henry's queens; but, during the reign of her half-sister, Mary, her life was in imminent danger through the jealousy of Mary, though she was allowed to remain in seclusion at Hatfield until her accession to the throne in 1558. Thus she was in her twenty-sixth year when she obtained the crown. Her first act was to release the imprisoned Protestants, and to reëstablish Protestantism. Next she concluded a peace with France and Scotland, entering into an undertaking with the reformers in the latter country to protect them from the Catholics; but in her own country, while zealously maintaining Protestantism, and severe in her proceedings toward those of her subjects who adhered to the formerly established religion, she was not less severe toward the Puritans, who were the most Protestant of all the sects, and who suffered many things at her hands. Very early in her reign she was troubled by the pretensions of the friends of Mary, queen of Scots, who was now the next heir to the throne. As Mary was a most zealous Catholic, the counsellors of Elizabeth were anxious that she should marry in order to secure the Protestant succession; but while she negotiated and coquetted with one person after another, she yet finally refused to marry, though it is believed that she would have accepted her favorite, the earl of Leicester, for a husband, if she had not been prevented by her other counsellors, and especially by Cecil, Lord Burleigh, the greatest of them all. Twelve years after her accession, in 1570, Elizabeth was excommunicated by Pope Pius V. Sixteen years later, in 1586, the Babington conspiracy was formed, the object of which was to reëstablish the papacy, and to set Mary, queen of Scots, on the throne of England, but which led only to the loss of her life by Mary, after she had been imprisoned in England for nineteen years. Two years after this conspiracy, in 1588, Elizabeth had to contend with a more formidable enemy in Philip II. of Spain, who avowed his resolution to annihilate Protestantism, but whose threatened invasion of the country was prevented by the defeat and destruction of the armada. Thus, a very considerable portion of Elizabeth's reign was occupied in defending her kingdom against attacks which were brought upon her chiefly because she adhered to the reformed faith. But the firmness and sagacity of Elizabeth's advisers, and especially of Burleigh, protected her against these dangers; and at the close of her reign, which lasted for forty-five years, England was stronger and greater than it had ever been before. To this reign belong the discoveries of Hawkins, Drake, and Sir Walter Raleigh. Spenser, Shakespeare, and Bacon belong also to the Elizabethan age. Elizabeth granted their first charter to the East India company, which was destined to win a new empire for England; and the encouragement she gave to seamen and discoverers generally caused her to be called "the restorer of the English navy," and "the queen of the northern seas." But Elizabeth was great mainly through her counsellors, among whom were some of the most eminent statesmen that England has produced. She died 1603, and was buried in Westminster abbey.

Elizabeth Petrovna (pā-trôv'-nä), empress of Russia, was born in 1709, and died in 1762. She was a daughter of Peter the Great, and became empress through the deposition of Ivan in 1741. During her reign, in which throughout she was guided by favorites, a war with Sweden was brought to a successful conclusion by the peace of Abo. Her animosity toward Frederick the Great led her to take part in the war of the Austrian succession and in the seven years' war.

Elkins, Stephen Benton, United States senator, was born in Perry county, Ohio, 1841. He went to Missouri in childhood; graduated from university of Missouri, 1860, served in the Union army, and was admitted to the bar in 1864. He went to New Mexico in 1864; member of territorial legislature, 1864-65; later territorial district attorney, attorney-general, 1868-69, and United States district attorney, 1870–72; delegate in congress from New Mexico, 1873–77. He then removed to West Virginia, and became largely interested in coal mining and railroads. Founded town of Elkins, W. Va. Was secretary of war, 1891–93, and, 1895–1911, United States senator from West Virginia. Died, 1911.

Elliot, Daniel Giraud, naturalist, curator of zoölogy, Field Columbian museum, was born in New York, 1835. He studied zoölogy, traveled in Europe, Africa, Palestine, and Asia Minor, 1856–78; later in greater part of United States, Canada, Alaska, South America. Led expedition into interior of East Africa in interest of Field Columbian museum, 1896, and into the recesses of the Olympic mountains, 1898, being first naturalist to penetrate that little-known range. Member of many learned societies, and decorated ten times by European governments for labors in natural science; Sc. D., Columbia, 1906. Author: Monograph of the Pittidæ, or Ant-Thrushes; The Grouse; New and Heretofore Unfigured Birds of North America (2 vols.); The Phasianidæ, or Pheasants (2 vols.); Paradiscidæ, or Birds of Paradise; The Felidæ, or Cats; Bucerotidæ, or Hornbills; Shore Birds of North America, etc. Contributor of many papers to scientific publications in America and Europe.

Elliott, Maxine, actress, was born in Rockland, Me., 1873, daughter of Thomas Dermot. She received a convent education, and married George A. McDermott, from whom she was divorced in 1896. In 1898 she married Nathaniel C. Goodwin, but was divorced in 1908. Made début with E. S. Willard in small parts, 1890; soon after played leading parts in Rose Coghlan's company; was under Augustin Daly's management playing leading rôles two seasons; became leading woman in Nat. Goodwin's company, 1898; starred in Her Own Way, 1903-05, Her Great Match, 1905-07; owner and manager of Maxine Elliott's theater, New York, since 1908.

Ellsworth, Oliver, American statesman and jurist, was born in Windsor, Conn., 1745. He became prominent in state affairs and in the continental congress, and was a member of the federal convention of 1787, which prepared the constitution of the United States. It was on his motion that the words "national government" in that organic act were replaced by the definition "government of the United States." He became United States senator from Connecticut in 1789, and was chairman of the committee which organized the federal judicial system. He led the federalist party in the senate, and was an earnest advocate of Jay's treaty with England in 1794. From 1796 to 1800 he was chief-justice of the United States supreme court, and in 1800 negotiated, with Patrick Henry and Governor Davie, a treaty with France. He afterward served on the governor's council of Connecticut, and in 1807 became chief-justice of the state supreme court. Died, 1807.

Elphinstone (ĕl'-fĭn-stun), Mountstuart, English statesman and historian, was born in 1779; educated at Edinburgh and Kensington, and entered the Bengal civil service in 1795. In 1803 he served with distinction on Wellesley's staff, and was appointed resident at Nagpur; in 1808 he was sent as envoy to Shah Shuja at Cabul; and as resident from 1810 at Poona both ended the Mahratta war of 1817 and organized the newly acquired territory. During his governorship of Bombay, 1819–27, he founded the present system of administration, and greatly advanced public education. He returned to England in 1829, and, declining the governor-generalship of India, lived in comparative retirement until his death at Hookwood, in Limpsfield parish, Surrey, 1859. His well-known History of India appeared in 1841.

Elphinstone, William, Scottish prelate and statesman, was born in 1431. He took his M. A. at Glasgow in 1452, was ordained priest, spent five years in France, and lectured on law at Paris and Orleans. He returned to Scotland, and became rector of the university and official-general of the diocese of Glasgow, official of Lothian, bishop of Ross and of Aberdeen. He was then engaged in embassies, and for four months before the death of James III., in 1488, was chancellor. Under James IV. he was ambassador to France, and keeper of the privy seal from 1492. It was chiefly through his influence that the first printing press — that of Chepman and Myllar — was established in Scotland. The university of Aberdeen (King's college) was founded by him in 1500. Additions to the cathedral and a stone bridge over the Dee were also due to him. The fatal battle of Flodden broke his spirit, and he died at Edinburgh in 1514.

Ely, Richard Theodore, educator, author, was born in Ripley, N. Y., 1854. He was graduated from Columbia, 1876; Ph. D., Heidelberg university, 1879; LL. D., Hobart college, 1892; professor of political economy, Johns Hopkins, 1881–92; professor of political economy, university of Wisconsin, since 1892; founder, secretary, 1885–92, president, 1899–1901, American economic association. Member of Baltimore tax commission, 1885-86; Maryland tax commission, 1886–88; founder, 1904, and since director of American bureau of industrial research. Author: French and German Socialism in Modern Times; Taxation in American States and Cities; Introduction to Political Economy; Outlines of Economics; The Social Law of Service; Monopolies and Trusts; Labor Movement in America; Past and Present of Political Economy; Problems of To-day; Social Aspects of Christianity; Socialism and Social Reform; The Coming City; Studies in the Evolution of Industrial Society, etc.

Emanuel I. (ĕ-măn'-ū-ĕl), king of Portugal, called "the great," or "the fortunate," was born in 1469, and became king in 1495. His reign is known as the golden age of Portugal. He prepared the code of laws which bears his name, and made his court a center of chivalry, of art, and of science. Vasco da Gama's voyage round the cape of Good Hope, Cabral's discovery of Brazil, and the expeditions of Albuquerque and others that so widened Portuguese possessions were all sent out and encouraged by Emanuel. It was he who made Portugal the first naval power of the world, as well as its great commercial center. He died at Lisbon, 1521.

Emanuel, Filibert, duke of Savoy, son of Charles III., was born in 1528; was commander-in-chief of the imperial troops in Italy against the French, who, on his father's death, seized most of his inheritance. Appointed governor of the Netherlands by Philip II. in 1556, he attacked France, winning the battle of St. Quentin, and by the treaty of Château-Cambresis, 1559, recovered his ancestral domains, and married Marguerite, sister of the king of France. He applied himself to the administrative and military organization of his country, and is considered the founder of the Sardinian monarchy. Died, 1580.

Emerson, Ralph Waldo. See page 112.

Emerton, Ephraim, educator, historian, professor of ecclesiastical history, Harvard, since 1882, was born in Salem, Mass., 1851. He was graduated from Harvard in 1871; Ph. D., Leipzig, 1876. Member of Massachusetts historical society, American academy of arts and sciences, American historical association, and corresponding member of Institut Genévois. Author: Introduction to the Study of the Middle Ages; Synopsis of the History of Continental Europe; Mediæval Europe, 814–1300; Desiderius Erasmus; etc.

Emin Pasha (ā'-mĕn pā-shā'), or Bey, proper name Eduard Schnitzer, was born at Oppeln, Silesia, in 1840. He studied medicine and in 1864 went to Turkey, where he became a well-known physician. He learned to speak Turkish and Arabic easily, and adopted Turkish habits and customs. He also adopted the name Emin, which means "faithful one." In 1876 he joined the Egyptian service and proceeded as chief physician to the equatorial province, of which he was made governor in 1878 by "Chinese" Gordon. Here on the sudden uprising of the Mahdi, his rescue reached him in May, 1888. In 1890 he entered the German service and at once made his way again to central Africa. He was killed, however, in 1892 by Arabs near Nyangwe.

Emmet, Robert, Irish enthusiast and revolutionist, was born at Dublin in 1778, the son of a Dublin doctor.. He was expelled from Dublin university in 1798 owing to his anti-English sympathies, and was henceforth an ardent though misguided partisan of Irish independence. His impulsive patriotism in 1803 led him to make an unsuccessful attack on Dublin castle, but he escaped into Wicklow. He was subsequently captured and executed the same year. His fate is the subject of a famous poem by Moore.

Empedocles (ĕm-pĕd'-ō-klēz), Greek philosopher, was born in Sicily about the middle of the fifth century B. C. He was poet, priest, physician, and philosopher, and followed Pythagoras in his teaching. He was very vain, and used to move about among the people dressed in long purple robes with a golden girdle, his flowing hair bound with a garland, a branch of laurel in his hand, and sandals of brass on his feet, while a procession of slaves followed him. Strange stories are told of his death, one being that he had thrown himself into the crater of Etna, hoping that people would think he had been translated to heaven.

Encke (ĕng'-kĕ), Johann Franz, German astronomer, was born at Hamburg in 1791. In 1825, chiefly at the instigation of Bessel, he was called to Berlin as director of the observatory. While at Gotha the astronomical prize was awarded to Encke by the judges, Gauss and Olbers, for his determination of the orbit of the comet of 1680. This led him to solve another problem, which had been proposed along with the other — viz., the distance of the sun — and his value of the solar parallax, giving a distance of about 95,000,000 miles, was for a long time accepted as the best known. In 1819 he showed that the comet discovered by Pons in 1818 revolved round the sun in the remarkably short time of 3.3 years, being identical with those observed in 1786, 1795, and 1805, and this comet has ever since been known by Encke's name. He was an indefatigable computer and did great service by developing and putting into convenient shape for use the new method of least squares discovered by Gauss. Died, 1865.

Endicott (ĕn'-dĭ-kŏt), or Endecott, John, Puritan governor of Massachusetts, was born at Dorchester, England, about 1588. He landed as manager of a plantation near Salem in 1628; headed a sanguinary expedition against the Indians in 1636; was deputy-governor in 1641–44, 1650, and 1654, and governor six times from 1644 to 1665. In 1658 he was president of the united colonies of New England. He died at Boston, 1665.

Endicott, William Crowninshield, descendant of the foregoing, was born in Salem, Mass., 1827; graduated at Harvard in 1847, and became a member of the Massachusetts bar. From 1873 to 1882 he was a judge of the Massachusetts supreme court. In 1884 he ran for governor of Massachusetts on the democratic ticket, but was defeated. In 1885 he became secretary of war in the cabinet of President Cleveland. He died in Boston, 1900.

Endlicher (ĕnt'-lĭk-ĕr), Stephan Ladislaus, Hungarian botanist and linguist, was born in Presburg in 1804. In 1836 he was appointed keeper of the court cabinet of natural history, Vienna, and in 1840 professor of botany and director of the botanic garden of the university. He was a chief founder of the Vienna academy and of the Annalen des Wiener Museums, made valuable contributions to the study of old German and classic literature, pointed out new sources of Hungarian history, and published several linguistic works. The most important of his botanical works is his Genera Plantarum, in which he lays down a new system of classification. Died, 1849.

Ennius (ĕn'-ĭ-ŭs), Quintus, Roman poet, the father of Roman literature, was born in 239 B. C. Cato "the elder" took him to Rome, where he taught Greek and Latin, and gained the friendship of the noblest Romans of his day. He was famous for his learning and his charming conversation. His writings were a poem on Roman history, plays for the theater, many of them adapted from the finest Greek plays, and short poems, a few of which remain. He died in Rome, 169 B. C.

Eötvös (ŭt'-vŭsh), József, distinguished Hungarian author, was born at Buda, 1813. He became an advocate in 1833, but soon resolved to devote himself exclusively to literature, in which field he had already won a great reputation by his comedies. After his return from a journey through Germany, France, England, Switzerland, and the Netherlands, he published his Prison Reform, which was instrumental in bringing about many wholesome improvements in regard to prisons. In 1867 he was appointed minister of religion and education, and in that capacity engaged actively in the work of reform. Died at Pesth, 1871.

Epaminondas (ē-păm'-ĭ-nŏn'-das), greatest of Theban generals and statesmen, was born about 418 B. C., and led a retired life until his fortieth year. After the stratagem by which his fellow citizens expelled the Spartans in 379, he joined the patriots; and, when sent to Sparta in 371 to negotiate peace, displayed as much firmness as eloquence. When war was resumed, he received the command, and with 6,000 men defeated twice that number at Leuctra. Two years later, with Pelopidas, he marched into the Peloponnesus, and incited several of the allied tribes to desert Sparta. On his return to Thebes, he was accused of having retained the supreme power beyond the lawful time, but was acquitted in consequence of his able defense. In 368 war was renewed, and Epaminondas made a somewhat unsuccessful invasion into the Peloponnesus. To atone for this he advanced with 33,000 men into Arcadia, and near Mantinea broke the Spartan phalanx, but was mortally wounded. Died, 362 B. C.

Épée, de la' (dē lă'-pā'), Charles Michel Abbé, one of the founders of the system of instruction for the deaf and dumb, was born at Versailles, France, 1712. In 1755 he first began to occupy himself with the education of two deaf and dumb girls. At his own expense he founded an institution for the deaf and dumb, and labored with unwearied zeal for its prosperity. Died, 1789.

Epictetus (ĕp'-ĭk-tē'-tŭs), celebrated stoic philosopher, who flourished in the first century, was born at Hierapolis, in Phrygia, and was originally a slave to Epaphroditus, one of Nero's freedmen. Having obtained his freedom, he retired to a hut and gave himself up wholly to the study of philosophy. His lessons were greatly admired, and his life afforded an example of unblemished virtue. Being banished from Rome, with the other philosophers, by Domitian, he settled at Nicopolis, in Epirus. Whether he ever returned to the Roman capital is uncertain; nor do we know the period at which he died. His memory was so much venerated that the earthen lamp which gave him light was sold for more than ninety pounds. His admirable Enchiridion, a manual of morality, is highly esteemed even to-day. His teachings approach very nearly the precepts of Christianity.

Epicurus (ĕp'-ĭ-kū'-rŭs), Greek philosopher, was born about 342 B. C. It is doubtful whether his birth occurred before or after his parents' removal from Gargettus, in Attica, to Samos. His youth was spent in that island, whence he removed to Athens, when about eighteen, and afterward taught at Colophon, Mitylene, and Lampsacus. He returned to Athens about 306, and remained there until his death. He was founder of the Epicurean school, who hold that the summum bonum consists in pleasure — chiefly mental pleasure. Died, 270 B. C.

Épinay, d' (dā' pē'-nĕ'), Madame, French writer, was born about 1725. In 1745 she formed a close intimacy with Rousseau, and presented him with a small house, the now famous Hermitage, which stood on one of her husband's estates in the woods of Montmorency. An unfortunate jealousy, however, which Rousseau conceived for Grimm, another friend of Madame d'Epinay, was followed by an open rupture with his benefactress, and in his Confessions he scrupled not to malign her by way of vengeance. Died, 1783.

Erasistratus (ĕr-a-sĭs'-tra-tŭs), one of the most famous physicians and anatomists of ancient times, flourished in the third century B. C., and is supposed to have been born at Iulis, in the island of Ceos. He resided for some time at the court of Seleucus Nicator, king of Syria. He founded a school of medicine, wrote several works on anatomy, practical medicine, and pharmacy.

Erasmus (ē-răz'-mŭs), Desiderius, one of the greatest scholars of the renaissance, was born in Rotterdam about 1467; on his parents' death he entered a monastery, which he left to become a teacher at Paris, and at the invitation of his pupil, Lord Mountjoy, came to England. He settled at Oxford, where he became the friend of More, and studied divinity under Colet, and Greek under Grocyn and Linacre. In 1506 he visited Italy, staying at Bologna and Rome, where he was warmly received, but returned to England, and was made Margaret professor of divinity and professor of Greek at Cambridge. He returned to the continent, and after a journey to the low countries, settled at Basel, where he published his edition of the new testament. Erasmus was in favor of moderate reform in the church, as is shown by his Enchiridion Militis Christiani and Encomium Moriæ, but he gave little support to Luther, although he refused to write against him. Died, 1536.

Eratosthenes (ĕr'-ȧ-tŏs'-thē-nēz), eminent Greek writer, called, on account of his varied erudition, the philologist, was born at Cyrene about 276 B. C. By Ptolemy Euergetes he was called to Alexandria to superintend his great library. Here he died of voluntary starvation, at the age of eighty, having become blind and wearied of life. As an astronomer he holds an eminent rank among ancient astronomers. He measured the obliquity of the ecliptic, and the result at which he arrived — viz., that it was 23° 51′ 20″ — must be reckoned a very fair observation, considering the age in which he lived. Hipparchus used it, and so did the celebrated astronomer Ptolemy. A letter to Ptolemy, king of Egypt, on the duplication of the cube, is the only complete writing of his that we possess. Eratosthenes' greatest claim to distinction, however, is as a geometer.

Erckmann-Chatrian (ĕrk'-măn-shä'-trē'-äɴ') (Émile Erckmann and Alexandre Chatrian), two French men of letters, the first of whom was born at Phalsbourg, 1822; the second in the village of Soldatenthal, 1826. The two friends employed their pens in the same works, which they signed with the two names united in one; and it was only about 1863 that the authors informed their readers that the numerous works of fiction, which had obtained a widespread popularity, and were supposed by the general public to be the work of a single writer, were the fruits of their friendly collaboration. In 1848 they published several feuilletons in the Democrate du Rhin, which had just been started; Le Sacrifice d' Abraham, Le Bourgmestre en Bouteille. At the same time they wrote a drama, Le Chasseur des Ruines. Le Joueur de Clarinette, a simple story of a musician, and Les Amoureux de Catherine, another tale of village life in the same volume, are nearly perfect as literary efforts. Erckmann died in 1899; Chatrian, 1890.

Eric (ĕr'-ĭk) the Red, Norwegian navigator, was born about 950 and died about 1000. In 982 he located on the island of Iceland, and in 983 sailed from Bredifiord to reach some western shore said to have been visited by one of his countrymen in former times. On the voyage he passed Cape Farewell, and on the coast met with reindeer. He named the country Greenland and the inlet Ericfiord. Returning to Iceland in 985, he interested the people of the island in his discovery, and with twenty-five sail set out for the voyage. Some of the ships were lost in a storm, and others were driven home; but he succeeded in reaching the Greenland coast with fourteen, and located on the fiord at some distance from the ocean where there was grass and trees. About twelve years later his son Lief is said to have discovered the continent of North America, which he called Markland and Vinland.

Ericsson (ĕr'-ĭk-sŭn), John, Swedish-American engineer, was born in Lanzbanshyttan, Sweden, 1803. At the age of twelve he became cadet of engineers, and at seventeen entered the Swedish army; in 1826 he was promoted to captain. In 1828 he constructed a flame engine, and went to London to introduce it, resigning his captaincy in the army. He also produced in succession an instrument for sea-sounding, a hydrostatic ture of Cadiz in 1596. He quarreled with the queen about an appointment, turning his back upon her in the presence of her ministers, and when she resented the indignity with a box on the ear, drew his sword, swearing that he would not endure such treatment from Henry VIII. himself. They were never really reconciled. After failing as lord-lieutenant of Ireland, he formed a wild scheme to get rid of Elizabeth's councilors, who were opposed to him. He entered London at the head of 300 men, expecting the people to rise in his favor, but was disappointed and forced to surrender. He was tried for treason, condemned, and beheaded in 1601.

Estaing (ĕs'-tăɴ'), Charles Hector, Count d', French admiral, was born in 1729. After serving in the army in India, under the Marquis de Bussy, and being made prisoner at the siege of Madras, he entered the navy and led an expedition to Sumatra, capturing several English forts. He was then placed in command of a squadron sent to aid the United States against England, captured the island of Grenada, but ultimately met with reverses, and returned to France in disgrace. He was guillotined during the revolution. Died, 1794.

Esterházy (ĕs'-tĕr-hä'-zē), Nicholas de, Hungarian patron of arts and sciences, was born in 1765, traveled over a great part of Europe, and resided for a considerable time in England, France, and Italy. He founded the splendid collection of pictures at Vienna. He also made a choice collection of drawings and engravings. When Napoleon, in 1809, entertained the notion of weakening Austria by the separation of Hungary, he made overtures to Prince Esterhazy respecting the crown of Hungary, which, however, were declined. Haydn composed most of his works at the court of Prince Nicholas. Died, 1833.

Esterházy, Prince Paul Anton, Austrian diplomat, was born in 1786. He entered at an early age on a diplomatic career. After the peace of Vienna he went as ambassador to the court of Westphalia. From 1815 to 1818 he represented the Austrian government at London. He filled the same office between 1830 and 1838, and distinguished himself by his diplomatic tact and ability. In 1842 he returned home and continued to exert himself in the cause of political and literary progress. In March, 1848, he became minister of foreign affairs; but when the struggle between Austria and Hungary broke out he exhibited more prudence than heroism by retiring from public life altogether. He died in 1866.

Esther, the Persian name of Hadassah, daughter of Abihail, a Benjamite. She was an orphan, and brought up by her cousin Mordecai, an officer in the household of the Persian monarch, Ahasuerus. Her history is extremely interesting, and set out in detail in the biblical book of that name. When the misconduct of Vashti had cost her her "royal estate," all "the fair virgins" of the kingdom were gathered together, that Ahasuerus might choose a successor. He selected Hadassah, who received the name of Esther on account of her loveliness. The great event of her life was the saving of her Jewish countrymen from the horrors of that universal massacre planned by the malice of Haman, and consented to by the thoughtless cruelty of an oriental despot. Esther is not mentioned in profane history, whence it has been inferred by some that she was not the only wife of Ahasuerus (Xerxes), but rather the favorite of his household, to which she undoubtedly belonged.

Ethelbert (ĕth'-ĕl-bĕrt), first Christian king of Kent, England, was born about 552. He was converted by his wife, Bertha, of France, and by St. Augustine. He gave the English the first written code of laws. Reigned from 560 to 616.

Euclid (ū'-klĭd), eminent geometrician, is said by Pappus and Proclus to have been a native of Alexandria, in which city he taught mathematics, during the reign of Ptolemy Lagus, about 300 B. C. It was he who first established a mathematical school there. He wrote on music, optics, catoptrics, and other subjects; but the work which has immortalized his name is The Elements of Geometry. Of the fifteen books which compose these elements, however, the last two are supposed to be the production of Hypsicles.

Eudocia (ū-dō'-shĭ-ȧ), Byzantine princess, wife of the emperor Theodosius II., was born about 393, the daughter of the sophist Leontius or Leon, who instructed her in the literature of Greece and Rome, in rhetoric, geometry, arithmetic, and astronomy. Her accomplishments and her singular beauty were reckoned by Leontius a sufficient fortune, for at his death he left all his property to her two brothers. Eudocia appealed to the emperor at Constantinople. Pulcheria, the sister of Theodosius, was interested in the maiden, and thought she would make a suitable wife for the emperor, to whom she was married, 421. For many years, however, Pulcheria ruled in the imperial household and councils, Eudocia, according to Nicephorus, "submitting to her as mother and Augusta"; but in 447 a quarrel broke out between them in regard to the Eutychian heresy, of which Eudocia had become a supporter. At first Eudocia was triumphant, and Pulcheria was banished; but in a short time the emperor was reconciled to his sister, and treated Eudocia so sharply that she retired to Jerusalem, where she died, 460 or 461. Eudocia was a poetess of considerable merit.

Eugene, François, usually called Prince Eugene of Savoy, celebrated Austrian general, was born in Paris, 1663. He was a son of Eugene Maurice, count of Soissons, who was grandson of the duke of Savoy, Charles Emmanuel I.; but his application for a commission in the army of France having been refused, in consequence of a difference between Louis XIV. and Eugene's mother, a niece of Cardinal Mazarin, he left France for Vienna, and offered his services to the emperor of Austria, in whose court and army he spent the whole of his remaining life. For fifty years, and under three emperors, he was one of the greatest and most successful of the Austrian generals, and was regarded as one of the most distinguished soldiers of his time. He was also eminent as a statesman, and inaugurated some important reforms in the constitution of the Austrian monarchy. In later life he took much interest in art and learning, and formed a valuable collection of engravings and books. Died in Vienna, 1736.

Eugénie-Marie de Montijo (ū'-zhā'-nē mȧ'-rē' de mōn-tē'-hō), ex-empress of the French, was born in Spain, 1826. She was the granddaughter of William Kirkpatrick, American consul at Malaga, whose daughter married Count de Montijo, an officer in the Spanish army. Her mother, the Comtesse Teba, took her to Paris, where she attracted great attention at the balls given at the Tuileries by Louis Napoleon, then prince president. The latter, after he made himself emperor, began negotiations for a union with the princess Carola Wasa of Sweden, which were peremptorily rejected. He made overtures to other reigning houses and, being each time refused, proposed to the charming young Spaniard, whom he married in 1853. The empress became the leader of the fashions of Europe, and maintained a brilliant court, but not content with her triumphs in this line she interfered in politics, and with most disastrous results. She forced on the war with Germany, which she spoke of as "my war," and in many ways her influence was bad for France. She was appointed regent when Napoleon III. went to fight the Germans, and was in Paris when the revolution broke out after Sedan. In 1870 she escaped from the Tuileries and sought refuge in England where she now resides.

Euler (oi'-lẽr), Leonard, distinguished mathematician, was born at Basel, Switzerland, 1707, and at the time of his death in 1783 was director of the mathematical department of the academy of St. Petersburg, having been previously professor of mathematics in the academy of sciences in Berlin. His works on algebra and other branches of pure mathematics are very numerous and of great value, notwithstanding that many of the later years of his life were spent in total blindness.

Euripides (ū-rĭp'-ĭ-dēz), the latest of the three Greek tragedians, was born at Salamis, 480 B. C., on the very day of the great victory gained by the Greeks over the Persians near the island. The Arundel marbles, however, gives 485 B. C. as the date of his birth. The first play of Euripides' which was performed was the Peliades. In 441 B. C. he gained the first prize for tragedy, and continued to write for the Athenian stage until 408 B. C., when he accepted an invitation to the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia. He is said to have been killed in 406 B. C. by dogs, which were set upon him by two brother-poets who envied him his reputation. Among his works are the Alcestis, Hecuba, and Medea.

Eusebius (ū-sē'-bĭ-ŭs) of Cæsarea, father of ecclesiastical history, was born in Palestine about 264, and died about 340. He took the name of Pamphili. In 313 he succeeded Agapius as bishop of Cæsarea, and took a prominent part in the council of Nice. Constantine declared that he was fit to be bishop of the world. Eusebius was the most learned father of the church after Origen.

Eustachio (ā'-ŏŏs-tä'-kyō), or Eustachius, Bartolommeo, Italian anatomist, was born in 1510. Few particulars are known regarding his life, but we learn from the introduction to one of his works that in 1562 he was professor of medicine in the Collegio della Sapienza at Rome. His name is indelibly associated with anatomical science through his discoveries of the tube in the auditory apparatus, and the valvular structure in the heart, which have been called after him. He was the first to give an accurate description of the thoracic duct, and was probably the first to notice and describe the stapes. Died, 1574.

Evans, Mary Ann or Marian. See Eliot, George.

Evans, Robley Dunglison, American admiral, was born in Floyd county, Va., 1846. He was appointed to the United States navy from Utah, and graduated from the United States naval academy in 1863; rear-admiral 1901. During the civil war he participated in both attacks on Fort Fisher, 1865, and in land attacks received four severe rifle-shot wounds. When in command of the Yorktown at Valparaiso, Chile, 1891, during the period of strained relations between Chile and the United States, his actions in connection with various incidents earned him his popular name of "fighting Bob." In war with Spain, commander of Iowa in Sampson's fleet off Santiago, taking active part in battle with Cervera's fleet, July 3, 1898; was president of board of inspection and survey; commander-in-chief at Asiatic station, October, 1902–04, and in command of the Asiatic expedition, 1907-08. Author: A Sailor's Log. Died, 1912.

Evans, Very Rev. Thomas Frye Lewis, prelate, dean of Montreal since 1902, was born at St. John's rectory, Simcoe, Ontario, 1845. He was educated at Upper Canada college, and Trinity university, Toronto. B. A., Toronto, 1866; M. A., 1871; hon. D. C. L., 1894; D. D., 1902; deacon, 1869; priest, 1870 (Huron); missionary at Norwich, Ontario, 1869–71; assistant, Christ Church cathedral, 1871–74; hon. canon, Christ Church cathedral, 1874; rector of St. Stephen's church since 1874; archdeacon of Iberville, 1882; archdeacon of Montreal, 1886.

Evarts, William Maxwell, American lawyer and statesman, was born at Boston, Mass., 1818, and died at New York city, 1901. He graduated at Yale, and was admitted to the New York bar in 1841, where he built up a notable practice — receiving as high as $50,000 for an opinion in a case. He was chief counsel for President Johnson, in the impeachment trial in 1868, and was United States attorney-general to the close of Johnson's administration. He was United States counsel before the Alabama tribunal in 1872, and senior counsel for Henry Ward Beecher in 1875. In 1877-81 he was secretary of state, and United States senator for the term 1885–91.

Evelyn, John, English author, was born at Wotton, in Surrey, 1620. He took part in political affairs during the reigns of Charles I., Charles II., and James II.; was the author of several scientific treatises, written in a popular style; but is now chiefly remembered for his Diary, which he kept during the greater part of his life, and which forms one of the most valuable collections of historical materials for the latter half of the seventeenth century. It was published in 1818. Among his other works are: Sylva, or a Discourse of Forest Trees, and Numismata, or a Discourse of Medals. Died, 1706.

Everett, Charles Carroll, Unitarian theologian, was born at Brunswick, Me., 1829. He graduated at Bowdoin college, 1850, and continued his studies at the university of Berlin; was professor of modern languages at Bowdoin, 1855–57; graduated at Harvard divinity school, 1859; held a pastorate at Bangor, Me., 1859–69; professor of theology at Harvard, 1869–1900, and dean of the divinity school after 1878. He wrote The Science of Thought; Religions before Christianity; Poetry, Comedy, and Duty; The Gospel of Paul, etc. Died, 1900.

Everett, Edward, American author, orator, and statesman, was born at Dorchester, Mass., 1794. He was graduated from Harvard, 1811, and was for some time a Unitarian clergyman. He became professor of Greek at Harvard in 1815; traveled in Europe from 1815 to 1818; became editor of the North American Review, and was a member of congress from 1824 to 1834; governor of Massachusetts from 1835 to 1839; and from 1840 to 1845, minister-plenipotentiary to England, in which capacity he succeeded in adjusting several delicate matters. He became secretary of state in 1852, and was elected to the United States senate in 1853. He wrote The Dirge of Alaric the Visigoth (a poem), Lives of Washington and General Stark, and other works, but was best known as an orator. He was made D. C. L. by Oxford, and LL. D., by Cambridge and Dublin universities. Died, 1865.

Ewald (ā'-vält), Georg Heinrich August von, German orientalist and theologian, was born at Göttingen, 1803. In 1820 he began the study of theology, philosophy, and oriental languages, and became professor at Göttingen in 1831. He was dismissed with six others in 1837 for remonstrating against the unconstitutional proceedings of the king of Hanover, and was professor at Tübingen from 1838 to 1848, when he was reinstated at Göttingen. He was a member of the North German and German parliaments. His works are numerous, but he is best known by his History of Israel and various writings on the old testament, linguistic, exegetical, and critical. Died, 1875.

Ewell (ū'-ĕl), Richard Stoddert, American soldier, was born in the District of Columbia in 1817. He graduated at West Point in 1840, and served in the Mexican war. In 1861 he entered the confederate service, and commanded a brigade at Bull Run. In 1862 he commanded a division in Jackson's campaign in the Shenandoah valley, and lost a leg in the second battle of Bull Run. He was made a lieutenant-general in 1863, and succeeded to the command of Jackson's corps, with which he was present at Gettysburg, the Wilderness, and Spottsylvania Court House. In April, 1865, he surrendered to General Sheridan at Sailor's Creek, Va. Died, 1872.

Ewing (ū'-ĭng), Thomas, American politician, was born in Ohio county, Va., 1789. He was admitted to the Ohio bar in 1816, and from 1831 to 1837 was United States senator from Ohio. Under Harrison he was secretary of the treasury for a month, in 1841, and in March, 1849, became the first secretary of the interior, which office he held until September 12, 1850. In 1850 he was appointed to succeed Thomas Corwin in the senate, but held office only a year, and spent the remainder of his life in the practice of his profession. He adopted as a member of his family his relative, William T. Sherman, afterward general of the United States army, who, in 1850, married Ewing's daughter Ellen. Died, 1871.

Eyck (īk), Hubert, and Jan van, two illustrious painters of the old Flemish school. Much discussion has arisen as to the time of the birth of these brothers, and the various dates assigned range from 1350 to 1400. Their birthplace was Maas-Eyck, and they chiefly resided at Bruges and Ghent, and became the founders of the Flemish school of painting. The masterpieces of the brothers are for the most part in the cities of Ghent, Bruges, Antwerp, Berlin, Munich, and Paris. Hubert died in 1426, and Jan in 1440.

Eyre (âr), Edward John, English colonial governor, was born in Yorkshire, England, 1815; went to Australia in 1833, and in 1840-41 explored the south coast of Australia and discovered Lake Torrens. He was afterward appointed lieutenant-governor of New Zealand and of the island of St. Vincent. In 1862 he became governor of Jamaica, and in 1865 suppressed with severity a negro insurrection. Martial law was proclaimed, and a wealthy mulatto named Gordon, who was a member of the house of assembly, was hanged. Eyre was recalled and prosecuted by a committee, of which John Stuart Mill was a member. Such men as Carlyle, Charles Kingsley, and Sir Roderick Murchison defended Eyre, and he was acquitted by a jury. Died, 1901.

Ezekiel, one of the four great Hebrew prophets, was the son of Buzi, and one of the sacerdotal race. He was carried to Babylon as a captive by Nebuchadnezzar, 598 B. C. Favored by the Lord with the gift of prophecy, he soothed, comforted, and admonished his countrymen, until at length he was stoned to death by order of the Babylonian authorities.

Ezekiel, Moses, American sculptor, was born at Richmond, Va., 1844. After service with a corps of cadets in Confederate States army, he graduated from Virginia military institute, 1866; studied anatomy at medical college of Virginia; removed to Cincinnati, 1868; visited Berlin, Germany, 1869, where he studied at royal academy of art under Professor Albert Wolf; admitted into society of artists, Berlin, on the merits of his colossal bust of Washington, and was the first foreigner to win Michael Beer prize. He executed the marble group representing religious liberty, for the Centennial exhibition, now in Fairmount park, Philadelphia; monument to Jessie Seligmann for orphan asylum, New York. After 1886 his work became chiefly ideal. Among his productions are busts of Liszt and Cardinal Hohenlöhe, Eve, Homer, David, Judith, Christ in the tomb, statue of Mrs. Andrew D. White for Cornell university; "Faith," in cemetery at Rome; "Madonna," for church in Tivoli; "Apollo and Mercury," in Berlin; "Robert E. Lee"; "Pan and Amor"; "The Fountain of Neptune," for town of Neptune, Italy; bust of Lord Sherbrooke, for St. Margaret, Westminster, London, and scores of busts and reliefs, and Jefferson monument, for Louisville, Ky.; Homer group for university of Virginia; "Virginia Mourning Her Dead" at Lexington, Va.; "Napoleon I. at St. Helena," etc.

Ezra, the scribe, was living in Babylon during the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, who commissioned him to lead a band of his fellow countrymen from Babylon to Jerusalem in 458 B. C., there to reorganize the returned Jews. He is believed to have arranged the books of the Mosaic law — the pentateuch — as it is now. The book which bears his name was anciently and justly regarded as forming one book with Nehemiah; and in their present shape Ezra and Nehemiah are simply the continuation of Chronicles.

Faber (fā'-bẽr), Frederick William, English hymnwriter, was born at Calverley in Yorkshire, 1814; graduated from Balliol college, Oxford, and in 1834 was elected a scholar of University college, in 1837 a fellow. He had already come under the influence of Newman, and in 1845, after three years' tenure of the rectory of Elton in Huntingdonshire, he followed him into the fold of Catholicism. He founded a community of converts at Birmingham — "the Wilfridians" — he himself being Brother Wilfrid, from his Life of St. Wilfrid. With his companions he joined in 1848 the oratory of St. Philip Neri; next year a branch under his care was established in London, and finally located at Brompton in 1854, where he died in 1863. Faber wrote many theological works; but his fame will rest upon his hymns, "The Pilgrims of the Night," "The Land beyond the Sea," etc.

Fabius (fā'-bĭ-ŭs), Maximus Quintus, Roman general, was born about 275 B. C. He was surnamed Cunctator because, having in 217 been appointed dictator for the second time and intrusted with the defense of Italy against the victorious Hannibal, he pursued a course of cautious and patient generalship, never risking a general engagement with his opponent, but cutting off his supplies, and gradually wearing him out, and meeting with signal success. Before his appointment to the dictatorship he was five times consul. Died, 203 B. C.

Fabricius (fă-brĭsh'-ĭ-ŭs), or Fabrizio (fā-brēt'-syō), Girolamo, commonly named from his birthplace Fabricius ab Aquapendente, celebrated anatomist and surgeon, was born in 1537, and died in 1619. He graduated from the university of Padua, where, in addition to the usual instruction in the classics, he studied anatomy and surgery under the celebrated Fallopius. On the death of the latter in 1562, Fabricius was appointed to fill the vacant professorship. Among his students was William Harvey, who attended his prelections in 1598, and who derived from Fabricius' observations on the valves of the veins the first clue to his great discovery. He was a most laborious investigator in comparative anatomy, and made comparative studies of the eye, the larynx, the ear, the intestinal canal, the development of the fœtus, and many other subjects. The improvements which his knowledge of anatomy enabled him to introduce into the practice of surgery were very great. His chief work was his Opera Chirurgica.

Faed (fād), John, Scottish painter, was born in 1819. In 1841 he settled in Edinburgh, where his talents won him a high reputation. His pictures include: "The Cruel Sisters"; "Shakespeare and his Contemporaries"; "The Cotter's Saturday Night"; "The Soldier's Return"; "The Wappenschaw"; "The Old Style"; "Tam o' Shanter"; "Hadden Hall of Old"; "The Stirrup Cup"; "John Anderson my Jo"; "The Gamekeeper's Daughter," and "The Hiring Fair." Died, 1902.

Faed, Thomas, brother of the preceding, and also an artist, was born in 1826. In 1849 he executed a very attractive work, entitled "Scott and his Friends at Abbotsford." In 1852 he removed to London, where his "Mitherless Bairn," exhibited in 1855, was declared by the critics to be "the picture of the season." His subsequent works include "Home and the Homeless"; "The First Break in the Family"; "Sunday in the Backwoods"; "From Dawn to Sunset"; "Baith Faither and Mither," and "The Last o' the Clan." He was made an R. A. in 1864. Died, 1900.

Fahrenheit (fä'-ren-hīt), Gabriel Daniel, physicist, improver of the thermometer, was born at Dantzic, Germany, 1686. In 1720 he first conceived the idea of using quicksilver instead of spirits of wine in the construction of thermometers, by means of which the accuracy of the instrument was very much improved. His thermometer, since its introduction, has been in general use in Holland, Great Britain, the United States, and other countries. Died, 1736.

Faidherbe (fĕ'-dĕrb'), Louis Léon César, French general, was born at Lille, France, 1818, and entered the French army in 1842. His earliest service was in Algeria, and in 1851 he took part in the campaign against the Kabyles, and a year later in the disastrous expedition in the highlands under General Bosquet. He was subsequently sent to Senegal, was invested with the government of the French possessions there, and after seven years' hard work renovated the colony. During the Franco-Prussian war he was in command of the army of the North and fought several battles. He subsequently went on a scientific mission to upper Egypt, was elected to the assembly in 1871, and became a senator in 1879. He was the author of a number of works on military and archæological subjects. Died, 1889.

Fairbairn (fâr'-bârn), Andrew Martin, Scottish theologian and principal emeritus of Mansfield college, Oxford, 1909-12, was born near Edinburgh, Scotland, 1838. He was educated at the universities of Edinburgh and Berlin, and at the Evangelical Union theological academy, Glasgow. For a time he held charges at Bathgate and Aberdeen, and from 1877 to 1886 was principal of Airedale college. In the latter year he was elected principal, on its foundation, of Mansfield college, Oxford, where his labors as a metaphysician and theologian have made him famous. His books embrace: Studies in the Philosophy of Religion and History; Studies in the Life of Christ; The City of God; Christ in Modern Theology; Christ in the Centuries; Religion in History and in Modern Life; Philosophy of the Christian Religion, etc. He visited the United States as Lyman Beecher lecturer at Yale; lectured also in India, at Edinburgh university, and at Aberdeen university. Died, 1912.

Fairbairn, Sir William, Scottish engineer, was born at Kelso, Scotland, 1789. He was the first to use iron instead of wood in the shafting of cotton mills. He was also among the earliest of iron shipbuilders, and made many improvements. Fairbairn built the tubular bridge across the Menai strait, after a plan of Robert Stephenson's, the Britannia and Conway bridges, and more than a thousand other bridges. He also devised improvements for steamboilers and other steam machinery. In 1869 he was made a baronet, and also a chevalier of the legion of honor. He published many works and papers on iron, bridges, boilers, mills, etc. He died at Moor Park, Surrey, England, 1874.

Fairbanks, Arthur, educator, author, was born in Hanover, N. H., 1864; graduated from Dartmouth college, 1886; Yale divinity school, 1887-88, Union theological seminary, 1888-89, Berlin and Freiburg, 1889-90; Ph. D., Freiburg in Breisgau, 1890; professor of Greek literature and archæology, university of Iowa, 1900–06; professor of Greek and Greek archæology, university of Michigan, 1906-07; director of Boston museum of fine arts since 1907. Editor of The Classical Journal. Author: Introduction to Sociology; First Philosophers of Greece; A Study of the Greek Pœan; The Mythology of Greece and Rome; Handbook of Greek Religion, etc. Translator of Riehl's Introduction to the Theory of Science and Metaphysics.

Fairbanks, Charles Warren, lawyer, ex-vice-president of the United States, was born on a farm near Unionville Center, Union county, Ohio, 1852; graduated from Ohio Wesleyan university, 1872; admitted to Ohio bar, 1874, and established practice at Indianapolis. Was republican caucus nominee for United States senator, 1893, but was defeated by David Turpie, democrat. Appointed in 1898 member of joint high British-American commission, and chairman of American commissioners. Elected United States senator from Indiana, 1897, and reëlected in 1903; vice-president of the United States 1904–09; representative of United States at the tercentenary celebration of Quebec, 1908.

Fairfax, Thomas, Lord, an English general, was born in Yorkshire, 1612. After serving with distinction in Holland, Lord Fairfax was declared general-in-chief of the parliament army at the opening of the civil war in 1642, and again in 1645. He distinguished himself in most of the great battles and sieges of that struggle, and after its close refused to act as one of the judges of Charles I. In 1659 Lord Fairfax used all his influence with the army to promote the restoration of Charles II. Died, 1671.

Falconio (fäl-kō'-nĭ-ō), Diomede, cardinal since 1911; was born in Pescocostanzo, in the Abruzzi, Italy, 1842. He entered the Franciscan order, 1860; on completion of studies in 1865 he was sent as a missionary to the United States; ordained priest, 1866, by Bishop Timon, of Buffalo; professor of philosophy and vice-president of St. Bonaventure's college, New York, 1866; professor of theology and secretary of Franciscan province of the Immaculate Conception, 1867; president of the college and seminary of St. Bonaventure, 1868; became citizen of United States, 1868; secretary and administrator of cathedral at Harbor Grace, Newfoundland, 1872–82; in United States, 1882–83; returned to Italy, 1883, and elected provincial of Franciscans in the Abruzzi; later reëlected and was also commissary and visitor-general, province of Naples, 1888; synodical examiner in diocese of Aquila; commissary and visitor-general Franciscan province in Puglia, 1889; procurator-general Franciscan order and visitor-general in various provinces of the order, 1889–92. Consecrated, 1892, bishop of Lacedonia, and was raised in 1895 to be archbishop of Acerenza and Matera, in Basilicata; apostolic delegate to Canada, 1899-1902; apostolic delegate to United States, 1902-11. A volume of his Pastoral Letters (translated into French) was published in Canada, 1900.

Falk (fälk), Adalbert, Prussian statesman, was born at Metschkau in Silesia, 1827, and as minister of public worship and education, in 1872, was instrumental in carrying the "May laws" (passed in May, 1873, 1874, and 1875) against the hierarchical supremacy of the church of Rome. When Bismarck made overtures for the support of the clerical party, Falk resigned in 1879, and retired from political life. He died in 1900.

Fallières (fäl'-yâr'), Clément Armand, French statesman, president of the French republic, 1906-13, was born near Agen, South France, 1841. He received his education at Angoulême and Paris; settled at Nérac as a barrister, and became mayor; elected to the chamber of deputies, 1876; under-secretary of state at home office, 1880; has been minister of the interior, of justice, and of education, and prime minister, and was eight times reëlected president of the senate. He was elected president of France in 1906, in succession to M. Loubet. He is a man of simple habits, great uprightness, and delights in supervising work on his vineyards, the Loupillon estate, in his native district. He is a lover of books, and has written verse both in French and in the Languedocien dialect. He married Mlle. Besson, daughter of a solicitor, and has two children — a son, who is a barrister, and a daughter.

Fallopius (fäl-lō'-pĭ-ŭs), Gabriel, Italian anatomist, physician, and naturalist of celebrity, was born at Modena in 1523, in the cathedral of which city he commenced his career as an ecclesiastic. He abandoned the priesthood for the pursuit of science, which he studied at Ferrara and Padua. At Pisa he was for three years professor of anatomy, and afterward went to Padua to fill the chair of anatomy and surgery, and to take charge of the first botanical garden established there. He died there in 1562. He acquired great fame by being the first to describe the anatomical structure of the fœtus. Observationes Anatomicæ is his principal work. Cuvier characterizes him as one of the three savants who restored, rather than created, the science of anatomy in the sixteenth century, the other two being Vesalius and Eustachius.

Faneuil (făn''l or făn'-yel), Peter, founder of Faneuil hall, Boston, Mass., was born in New Rochelle, N. Y., 1700. He was a rich merchant in Boston, and gave to the city a building for a market and town-hall. The building, which was finished just before his death in 1743, was burned in 1761, and the present one was built two years after by the town. So many important patriotic meetings were held in Faneuil hall during the revolution that it has been called the "cradle of American liberty."

Faraday (făr'-ȧ-dā), Michael, distinguished English chemist and natural philosopher, a splendid instance of success obtained by patience, perseverance, and genius over obstacles of birth, education, and fortune, was born in 1791 near London. He was largely self-educated, and in 1833 became professor of chemistry in the royal institution, London, where his lectures attracted the admiration of both Europe and America. His Christmas lectures at the royal institute were professedly addressed to the young, but contain in reality much that may well be pondered by the old. His manner, his unvarying success in illustration, and his felicitous choice of expression, though the subjects were often of the most abstruse nature, were such as to charm and attract all classes of hearers. Besides two sets on chemical subjects, we have his Lectures on the Physical Forces, a simple work, but in reality most profound, even in its slightest remarks. But the great work of his life is the series of Experimental Researches in Electricity, published in the Philosophical Transactions. Fully to understand all the discoveries contained in that extraordinary set of papers would require a knowledge of all that has been discovered during that time as to electricity, magnetism, electro-magnetism, and diamagnetism. Died, 1867.

Farel (fȧ'-rĕl'), Guillaume, Swiss reformer, was born in Dauphiné, in 1489, and studied at Paris. A convert to Protestantism, he, in 1524, sustained at Basel many Protestant theses. After being twice compelled to leave Geneva, he once more entered it in 1534; and in 1535 the town-council proclaimed the reformation. The organization of the Genevan church was undertaken by Calvin, and the severity of the ecclesiastical discipline produced a reaction, so that in 1538 the two reformers were expelled from the city. In 1557, together with Beza, Farel was sent to the Protestant princes of Germany to implore their aid for the Waldenses; and he next labored in the Jura mountains. In 1560 he was in Dauphiné preaching against Catholicism; and in 1561 was thrown into prison. He died at Neuchâtel, 1565.

Farnese (fär-nā'-sä), Alessandro. See Paul III., Pope.

Farragut (făr'-ȧ-gŭt), David Glasgoe, American admiral, was born near Knoxville, Tenn., 1801. At the age of nine years he entered the navy as midshipman, under Captain David Porter, of the frigate Essex. At the age of twenty-five he was made lieutenant, and appointed to the Norfolk navy-yard; in 1833 he commanded the Natchez, on the Brazil station, and in 1838 in the West Indies; in 1847 he was appointed to the sloop-of-war Saratoga; in 1851 made assistant-inspector of ordnance; in 1854 he was sent to construct a navy-yard in California, and in 1858, with the rank of captain, was appointed to the steam frigate Brooklyn in the home squadron. In 1862 he was appointed to the command of a naval expedition to act against the confederates in the gulf of Mexico. On April 24th, after a heavy cannonade, his squadron passed the forts at the mouth of the Mississippi, and on the 28th he received the surrender of New Orleans. Ascending the Mississippi he took Natchez. Raised to the rank of vice-admiral in March, 1863, he once more passed up the Mississippi, successfully ran past the confederate batteries of Fort Hudson, and aided General Grant in the combined attack on Vicksburg, which resulted in its capitulation July 4th. In August, 1864, after a furious engagement between his fleet and the confederate forts and vessels at Mobile, in which the monitor Tecumseh was sunk by a torpedo, with the loss of all on board, he succeeded in capturing the forts, which led to the fall of the city. In 1866 he attained the rank of admiral, and a purse of $50,000 was presented to him by New York merchants. He died in 1870.

Farrar (făr'-ȧr), Frederick William, English clergyman and author, was born in Bombay, India, 1831; educated at London and Cambridge, and was ordained in the church of England in 1854. He became a master of Harrow, and from 1871 to 1876 was head master of Marlborough college. In 1876 he became canon of Westminster, in 1883 archdeacon, and in 1895 dean of Canterbury. He ranks among the most eloquent of English pulpit orators, and published many works on educational, theological, and other subjects. Chief of these are: Seekers After God; Witness of History to Christ; The Silence and Voices of God; and the Life of Christ. His work Eternal Hope created a sensation on account of its broad views concerning future punishment. Died, 1903.

Farrar, Geraldine, grand opera singer, was born at Melrose, Mass., 1882, daughter of Sydney and Henrietta (Barnes) Farrar; graduated at Melrose, Mass., public school, and received her musical education at Paris and Berlin. Made début, Royal opera house, Berlin, as Marguerite in Faust, October, 1901. She sang with the Berlin royal opera in and after 1901; with Metropolitan opera from 1906, and has appeared frequently both in Europe and United States in concert.

Fassett (făs'-ĕt), Jacob Sloat, lawyer, capitalist, former member of congress, was born in Elmira, N. Y., 1853; graduated from Rochester university, 1875; studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1878; district attorney of Chemung county, 1878–80; studied law and political economy, Heidelberg university, 1880-81; state senator, New York, 1884–91; temporary chairman of republican national convention, Minneapolis, 1892; secretary of republican national committee, 1888–92; republican nominee for governor of New York, 1891, but defeated. Has large mining, cattle ranch, banking, and other interests in West. Member of congress, thirty-third New York district, 1905–11.

Faunce (fôns), William Herbert Perry, educator, president of Brown university since 1899, was born at Worcester, Mass., 1859. He was graduated from Brown university, 1880; Newton theological seminary, 1884; D. D., Brown, 1897; Yale, 1901; Harvard, 1904; LL. D., Baylor, 1904; Alabama, 1905. Instructor in mathematics, Brown university, 1881-82; pastor of State Street Baptist church, Springfield, Mass., 1884–89; pastor of Fifth Avenue Baptist church, New York city, 1889–99; lecturer in university of Chicago, 1897-98; Lyman Beecher lecturer, Yale university, 1907-08. Author: The Educational Ideal in the Ministry, and many contributions to religious and educational periodicals.

Faure (fōr), François Félix, president of France, was born in Paris, 1841. A Roman Catholic, though of Protestant ancestry, and a moderate republican, he was a self-made man, having been first a journeyman currier in Touraine, but ultimately a merchant and shipowner at Havre. He served as a volunteer in the Franco-German war, in 1881 became deputy for Havre, and after holding posts in several administrations, in January, 1895, succeeded Casimir-Perier as president. He died of apoplexy in 1899.

Faust (foust), Dr. Johann, famous magician and dealer in the black art, lived in the sixteenth century. He has been made a noted character in literature, and became the hero of Goethe's Faust. Luther spoke of him as the type of the "infidel and impious man." The story is that he obtained his art from Satan, making a contract that the devil should serve him for twenty-four years, and at the end of that time should have possession of his soul. The contract was signed with his own blood. Marlowe and Goethe have both made the story the subject of a drama. He is said to have died in 1540.

Faust, or Fust, Johann, German printer, was born in Mainz, Germany, was associated with Gutenberg in the first introduction of printing. He probably had nothing to do with the invention of printing, but furnished the capital to introduce the new art. The process was kept secret at first, but, at the sacking of Mainz in 1462, Faust's workmen were scattered and the new art became public property. A Latin Bible in the Mazarin library is thought to have been printed by Gutenberg and Faust. Probable date of death, at Paris, 1466.

Favart (fà'-vär'), Charles Simon, French dramatist, was born at Paris, 1710. In 1745, as director of the Opéra Comique, he and his wife made the first attempt to harmonize the actors' costumes with their impersonations. This excited the jealousy of the other theaters, and the Opéra Comique was closed in its first year. After spending some time in Flanders in the army under Marshal Saxe, Favart returned to Paris and continued to write operas. His most celebrated pieces are Le Coq du Village; Bastien et Bastienne; Ninette à la Cour; Les Trois Sultanes; and L'Anglais à Bordeaux. Died, 1792.

Favre (fà-vr'), Jules Claude Gabriel, French statesman and orator, was born at Lyons, 1809, studied for the bar, and was engaged in the July revolution of 1830. After this he took a prominent part in politics as an uncompromising republican. The coup d'état closed his political career, and he returned to his profession. In 1858 he defended Orsini; this procured his election to the legislature for Paris, and he became one of the leaders of the republicans against Napoleon III. In September, 1870, after the fall of the empire, he was appointed minister of foreign affairs, and in 1871 settled the terms for the capitulation of the capital. He resigned office in July, 1871, resumed practice at the bar, and died in 1880.

Fawcett (fô'-sĕt), Henry, English statesman, was born at Salisbury in 1833. He graduated at Cambridge in 1856, and commenced to read for the bar. In September, 1858, when they were shooting, shots from his father's gun entered both Fawcett's eyes, totally blinding him. His Manual of Political Economy led to his election to the chair of political economy at Cambridge in 1863, a post which he held until his death. Other writings are The Economic Position of the British Labourer and Protection and Free Trade. He was elected to parliament in 1865, and again in 1868. He urged measures for the abolition of religious tests at the universities, the extension of the factory acts to agricultural children, the promotion of compulsory education, the preservation of commons and open spaces, and the better government of India. He strongly opposed, in 1873, Gladstone's Irish university bill. In 1874 he lost his seat for Brighton, but was elected for Hackney. He opposed legislative restrictions upon the industry of women, and was a warm supporter of their claims to representation. In 1880 he was again elected for Hackney, and Gladstone offered him the postmaster-generalship, which he accepted. Here he carried several reforms — the introduction of the parcel post, postal orders, and sixpenny telegrams. He died in 1884.

Fawcett, Millicent Garrett, widow of Henry Fawcett, was born at Aldeburgh, Suffolk, 1847. She has taken a keen interest in the higher education of women and the extension of the franchise to women, and received the degree of LL. D. from St. Andrews university. She was made president of the women's unionist association in 1889. Author: Political Economy for Beginners; Tales in Political Economy; Essays and Lectures (jointly with Henry Fawcett); Some Eminent Women of our Time; Life of Queen Victoria; Five Famous French Women, etc.

Fawkes (fôks), Guy, properly Guido, the head of the conspiracy known as the gunpowder plot, was born of a Protestant family in Yorkshire in the year 1570. He became a Roman Catholic at an early age and served in the Spanish army in the Netherlands. Inspired with fanatical zeal for his new religion, on his return to England he entered into a plot to blow up the king, his ministers, and the members of both houses of parliament, November 5, 1605. He was taken with the burning match in his hand, tried, and, after having been put to the torture, was publicly executed in 1606.

Fechner (fĕᴋ'-nĕr), Gustav Theodor, physicist and psychophysicist, was born at Gross-Särchen, in lower Lusatia, 1801; became professor of physics at Leipzig in 1834, but afterward devoted himself to psychology; laid the foundations of the science of psychophysics in his Elements of Psychophysics; wrote besides on the theory of color and galvanism, as well as poems and essays. Died, 1887.

Felix (fē'-lĭks), Antonius, or Claudius, Roman governor of Judea at the time of the apostle Paul. His wife was Drusilla, according to Tacitus a granddaughter of Antony and Cleopatra. He was an energetic ruler, clearing the country of the robber bands that abounded, and holding the seditious Jews in check. When Paul was brought before him as a prisoner, and he heard him "concerning the faith in Christ," he trembled and said: "Go thy way for this time. When I have a convenient season I will call for thee." When Felix was recalled in 62 A. D. to Rome, he left Paul in prison to please the Jews.

Felton (fĕl'-tŭn), Cornelius Conway, American scholar, was born in West Newbury, Mass., 1807; died in Chester, Pa., 1862. He was graduated from Harvard in 1827, and in 1834 received the Eliot professorship of Greek literature. Later he became a regent of the university. In 1853-54 he visited Europe and studied modern Greek. In 1858 he made a second visit to Europe and in 1860 was chosen president of Harvard, in which office he continued until the time of his death. He was also one of the regents of the Smithsonian institution. President Felton made many contributions to literature in the leading magazines and reviews, and published translations of modern European works and editions of Greek classics.

Fénelon (fā'-ne'-lôɴ'), François de Salignac de La Mothe, eminent French preacher and author, archbishop of Cambray from 1695 to the time of his death, was born at the Château de Fénelon, in Périgord, France, 1651, and died at Cambray, 1715. As a preacher he was remarkable for his persuasive eloquence; as a writer he was distinguished for his tender and mystic devotion, and for the purity of his style. Before his elevation to the archbishopric, he was tutor to the grandsons of Louis XIV., for whom he composed several works, among them his best-known work, Telemachus. He was also the author of Maxims of the Saints in the Interior Life, for which he was strongly denounced by his great contemporary, Bossuet, and which was condemned, on account of its tendency to mysticism, by Pope Innocent XII. As a man, Fénelon was distinguished for the simplicity of his character, and for his Christian piety and charity.

Fenn, William Wallace, theologian, Bussey professor of theology at Harvard university since 1901, was born in Boston, Mass., 1862; graduated from Harvard, 1884; A. M., 1887; Harvard divinity school, 1887; D. D., 1908. Entered the Unitarian ministry, 1887; minister of Unity church, Pittsfield, Mass., 1887–91, First Unitarian society, Chicago, 1891–1901; Shaw lecturer biblical literature, Meadville theological school, 1892–1901, 1905–07; preacher to Harvard, 1896–98, 1902–05; dean of Harvard divinity school since 1906. Author: Lessons on Luke; Lessons on Acts; The Flowering of the Hebrew Religion; Lessons on Psalms, etc.

Ferdinand I., emperor of Germany, son of Philip I. of Spain and younger brother of Charles V., of Germany, was born in 1503. On the death of his grandfather Maximilian, he received the archduchy of Austria and the other German possessions of the house of Hapsburg. He succeeded his brother-in-law Louis II. of Bohemia and Hungary, and waged a long and bloody war with Zapolya for the possession of Hungary, only partially succeeding. In 1531 Ferdinand was elected king of the Romans, and in 1556 he succeeded Charles V. as emperor. He was tolerant to the Protestants, whom he tried to reconcile with Rome. Died, 1564.

Ferdinand II., emperor of Germany and king of Hungary and Bohemia, was born in 1578. He was a grandson of Ferdinand I., and duke of Styria. His cousin, the emperor Matthias, in 1617 surrendered to him the rule of Bohemia, and he succeeded him as emperor in 1619. His intolerance had shortly before kindled the thirty years' war. The Bohemians now offered their crown to the elector palatine Frederick V., and joined forces with Bethlen Gabor of Transylvania. After the overthrow of Frederick in 1620, Ferdinand abolished the charter of Bohemia, oppressed the Protestants, and prosecuted the war under Tilly, Wallenstein, and others. Died, 1637.

Ferdinand I., the Great, king of Castile and Leon, was the second son of Sancho III., king of Navarre and Castile, and succeeded to the latter kingdom in 1037. His success against the Moors extended the Christian frontiers to the Mondego, and by him also the rulers of Toledo, Saragossa, and Seville were reduced to vassalage. He was one of the most powerful monarchs of his age, and disputed with Henry III. of Germany for the imperial crown. In 1056 he assumed the title of emperor of Spain. Died, 1065.

Ferdinand IV., king of Naples and afterward king of the Two Sicilies as Ferdinand I., was born in 1751. He became king in 1759, but his imperious wife, Carolina Maria, daughter of Maria Theresa, and her favorite minister, Acton, ruled the court in the interest of the cabinets of Vienna and London, and against France. In 1799 the French occupied his capital and Ferdinand retired to Sicily. The Parthenopean republic was established, but after a few months Ferdinand was restored, and a reign of terror was inaugurated. In 1801 he was obliged to yield to French domination. In 1805 he was driven from the throne of Naples, which was given by Napoleon to his brother, Joseph. In 1812 he granted his Sicilian subjects a constitution, in 1815 was restored to his former throne, and in 1816 united Sicily and Naples into a single state. His despotism provoked the revolution of 1820, which was suppressed by Austrian intervention. Died, 1825.

Ferdinand II., king of the Two Sicilies, grandson of the preceding, was born in 1810. He succeeded his father Francis I. in 1830, and at first introduced reforms and liberal measures, but soon adopted the principles of absolutism. The history of the kingdom from that time is a series of conspiracies and rebellions, followed by trials and executions. In 1848 a general insurrection broke out in Sicily, followed by movements in Naples, and a constitution was granted, but soon abrogated in Naples, and after a protracted struggle the old order was restored in Sicily. From his having ordered the bombardment of his principal cities, he received the designation bombardatore, abbreviated into Bomba. His harsh treatment of political prisoners led in 1857 to a diplomatic rupture with Sardinia, France, and England. Died, 1859.

Ferdinand V. of Castile, III. of Naples, and II. of Aragon and Sicily, surnamed the Catholic, son of John II., was born in 1452, and succeeded his father on the throne of Aragon and Sicily in 1466. In 1469 he was married to Isabella, sister of Henry IV. of Castile, and in 1479 became, through her, king of Castile, Isabella sharing with him the royal dignity. The reign of Ferdinand and Isabella was signalized by the discovery of America by Columbus.

Ferdinand died in 1516, Isabella having died twelve years before him. After the death of Isabella he acted simply as regent of the kingdom, having handed over the crown to his daughter Juana, in accordance with the will of Isabella.

Ferguson (fĕr′-gŭ-sŭn), John, senior physician, Toronto Western hospital, editor of The Canada Lancet, was born at Glasgow, Scotland, 1854. He was graduated from the university of Toronto, and later studied at Edinburgh and London. Was demonstrator of anatomy in medical department, Toronto university, for eleven years; lectured on nervous diseases, and was for some years examiner in anatomy; took an active part in the organization of the Excelsior life insurance company, the Ontario publishing company, the Toronto Western hospital, and of the Ontario hospital association, and has been in medical practice for twenty-five years. Besides editing The Canada Lancet, he has published numerous articles and addresses.

Fergusson, James, Scottish historian of architecture, was born at Ayr, Scotland, 1808. After ten years as an indigo planter in Bengal, he explored nearly every corner of India, studying the rock-temples, which were illustrated in his earliest works. His History of Architecture appeared first as a handbook in 1855. Besides works on fortification, he also published The Palaces of Nineveh and Persepolis Restored, Tree and Serpent Worship, and Rude Stone Monuments. He died in 1886.

Ferrari (fĕr-rä′-rē), Giuseppe, Italian philosopher, was born in Milan, 1812; studied law at Pavia, but afterward devoted himself to literature. He first won notice by his edition of Vico's works. After a sojourn in France he was professor of philosophy at college of Rochefort, and afterward at Strassburg. In 1859 he returned to Italy, becoming successively professor at Turin and Milan. He died at Rome in 1876. Among his principal writings are: Essai sur le Principe et les Limites de la Philosophie de l'Histoire, Filosofia della Rivoluzione, and Corso di Lezioni sugli Scrittori Politici Italiani.

Ferreira (fĕr-rĕ′-ē-rä), Antonio, Portuguese poet, was born at Lisbon in 1528. He is considered the reformer of the national poetry of Portugal, and as the Portuguese Horace. He was brought up to the law, but devoted his attention mainly to literature. He obtained an important situation at court, and his Inez de Castro, the second regular tragedy produced after the revival of letters in Europe, gave him great celebrity. He died in 1569.

Ferrero (fĕr-rā′-rō), Guglielmo, Italian historian, was born in 1872. He lectured at Milan on militarism, and in the Collège de France, Paris, on Roman history, and while there received the cross of the legion of honor. He has traveled extensively in Europe and America, and is known in the latter country for his very acute observations on American manners and institutions. Author: Symbols, The Greatness and Decline of Rome, and collaborated with Professor Lombroso in the Female Offender.

Ferry, Jules François Camille, distinguished French statesman, was born at Saint Dié, in the Vosges, 1832. Admitted to the Paris bar in 1854, he speedily plunged into the politics of the time, and offered uncompromising opposition to the party of Louis Napoleon; as a member of the corps législatif he opposed the war with Prussia, but as central mayor of Paris rendered signal service during the siege by the Germans; during his tenure of office as minister of public instruction in 1879 was instrumental in bringing about the expulsion of the Jesuits; as prime minister in 1880 and again in 1883–85 he inaugurated a spirited colonial policy, which involved France in war in Madagascar, and brought about his downfall. Elected to the senate, 1890, and became its president one month before his death, 1893.

Fesch (fĕsh), Joseph, cardinal archbishop of Lyons, was born in Ajaccio, 1763, the half-brother of Letizia Ramolino, Bonaparte's mother. He took holy orders, but became commissary to the revolutionary army of the Alps in Italy. Having resumed the clerical habit, he helped on the concordat with Pope Pius VII. in 1801, and was raised to be archbishop of Lyons, 1802, and cardinal, 1803. In 1804 he was French ambassador to Rome, and two years later he was appointed associate and successor of Dalberg, prince primate of the confederation of the Rhine. At a conference of clergy in Paris in 1810 he gave utterance to views which lost him the favor of Napoleon, who was further exasperated by his letter to the pope, then in captivity at Fontainebleau. He retired to Lyons, and, at the approach of the Austrians in 1814, he fled to Rome, where he died in 1839.

Fessenden (fĕs′-en-den), William Pitt, American statesman, was born in New Hampshire in 1806. He graduated at Bowdoin college in 1823, and was admitted to the bar in 1827. He entered congress in 1841, served one term and was United States senator, 1854–64; secretary of the treasury, 1864–65; and again United States senator, 1865–69. He voted for the acquittal of President Johnson; was one of the founders of the republican party, and distinguished himself as a debater in the senate. He ranked among the first lawyers of his time, and made a notable reputation before the United States supreme court. Died, 1869.

Fetter, Frank Albert, educator, economist, was born in Peru, Ind., 1863; graduated at Indiana university, 1891; Ph. M., Cornell, 1892; Ph. D., Halle, 1894; LL. D., Colgate, 1909,; post-graduate studies at the Sorbonne and École de Droit, Paris, 1892-93, and Halle, 1893-94; was a bookseller, 1883–90, Peru, Ind.; winner interstate oratorical contest, Des Moines, Ia., 1891; instructor of political economy, Cornell, 1894-95; professor of Indiana university, 1895–98, Leland Stanford Jr., 1898–1900; professor of political economy and finance, 1901-10, economics and distribution, 1910-11, Cornell; professor of economics and head department history, politics and economics since 1911, Princeton. Author: Relations Between Rent and Interest; The Principles of Economics; articles, monographs, etc., on economic subjects.

Fetterolf, Adam H., educator, president of Girard college, 1882-1910, was born at Perkiomen, Pa., 1841; graduate of Ursinus college; A. M., 1865, Ph. D., 1878, Lafayette college; LL. D., 1886, Delaware college. Was vice-president of Girard college, 1880–82. Member of the historical society of Pennsylvania, American academy of political and social science, etc. Died, 1912.

Feuerbach (foi′-ĕr-bäᴋ), Ludwig Andreas, German philosopher, was born at Landshut, 1804, and studied at Heidelberg. For a time he engaged in business, devoting his leisure to literary pursuits; but the greater part of his life was spent in retirement. His works include a history of modern philosophy from Bacon to Spinoza, an explosion of the philosophy of Leibnitz, The Essence of Christianity, The Essence of Religion, and God, Freedom, and Immortality. The leading principle of his philosophy, a naturalistic development of Hegelianism, is that there is no God distinct from nature and man. Died, 1872.

Feuerbach, Paul Johann Anselm von, jurist, father of the preceding, was born at Jena, 1775, where he studied law. He had made a brilliant reputation by his Kritik des natürlichen Rechts, and his Anti-Hobbes. His Lehrbuch des gemeinen peinlichen Rechts placed him at the head of the new school of rigorists. His penal code for Bavaria was taken as a basis for amending the criminal law of several other countries. In 1808–11 he published a great collection of criminal cases. In his Geschworenengericht he maintained that the verdict of a jury is not adequate legal proof of a crime. Appointed a judge at Bamberg, 1814, and at Anspach, 1817. He died at Frankfort, 1833.

Feuillet (fû'-yĕ'), Octave, French novelist, was born at Saint-Lô, in La Manche, 1821. He started his literary career as one of Dumas's assistants, but made his first independent success in the Revue des Deux Mondes by a series of tales and romances begun in 1848. In 1862 he was elected a member of the academy, and later became librarian to Louis Napoleon; his novels, of which Le Roman d'un Jeune Homme Pauvre and Sibylle are the most noted, are graceful in style, and reveal considerable dramatic force, but often lapse into sentimentality, and too often treat of indelicate subjects, although in no spirit of coarseness. Died, 1890.

Fichte (fĭκ'-tĕ), Johann Gottlieb, German philosopher, was born at Rammenau, in upper Lusatia, 1762. During the years 1784–88 he supported himself in a precarious way as tutor in various Saxon families. In 1791 he obtained a tutorship at Warsaw, in the house of a Polish nobleman. The situation, however, proved disagreeable, and was given up by the fastidious philosopher, who next proceeded to Königsberg, where he had an interview with Kant, of whom he had become an ardent disciple. Here he wrote, in 1792, his Critique of all Revelation. In 1794 he was appointed to the chair of philosophy at Jena, where he commenced to expound with extraordinary zeal his system of transcendental idealism. In 1798 he removed to Berlin, where he delivered lectures on philosophy to a select auditory. In 1800 there appeared his work On the Destiny of Man. In 1805 he obtained the chair of philosophy at Erlangen, with the privilege of residing at Berlin in the winter. Here he delivered his celebrated lectures On the Nature of the Scholar. The victories of Napoleon at Auerstädt and Jena drew forth Addresses to the Germans. These addresses were full of the most exalted enthusiasm. The Prussian king appreciated the zeal of the eloquent metaphysician, and, on the restoration of peace, requested him to draw up a new constitution for the Berlin university. In 1810 the university was opened with a host of brilliant names, Fichte, Wolff, Müller, Humboldt, De Wette, Schleiermacher, Neander, Klaproth, and Savigny. By the votes of his colleagues Fichte was unanimously elected rector. He died in 1814.

Fick, August, German philologist, was born near Minden, 1833, studied at Göttingen, and became professor there in 1876, and at Breslau in 1887. He retired in 1891. His great comparative Indo-Germanic dictionary has been followed by works on Greek personal names, the original language of the Iliad, etc.

Field, Cyrus West, founder of the Atlantic cable company, was born at Stockbridge, Mass., 1819. He first became a clerk in New York, but soon had a prosperous business of his own. Being joined by Peter Cooper, Moses Taylor, and other American capitalists, he organized, in 1854, the New York, Newfoundland, and London telegraphic company, and, in 1856, the Atlantic telegraph company. Devoting himself entirely to the work of uniting the old and new worlds, he crossed the ocean nearly thirty times in its prosecution; and on the laying of the first cable, 1858, was received by his countrymen with enthusiastic plaudits. He continued his exertions, and on the success of the cable of 1866 received a gold medal from congress and a vote of thanks from the American nation. In 1871 Field was one of the originators of the company which undertook to lay a cable across the Pacific ocean via the Sandwich islands to China and Japan. From 1876–80 he was actively engaged in the rapid-transit problems in New York, and became largely identified with the elevated railway interests of that city. Died, 1892.

Field, David Dudley, American jurist, was born at Haddam, Conn., 1805, entered Williams college, 1821, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1828. He settled in New York, and soon made his way into the front rank of his profession. In 1847 he was appointed by the legislature of New York one of a commission to reform the practice of the state. In this work he was engaged nearly a quarter of a century, carrying it on at the same time with a large professional practice. In 1866 he brought before the British association for social science a proposition to frame an international code. This led to the preparation by him of what was really a complete work on international law, though entitled Draft Outlines of an International Code, one feature of which was the principle of arbitration to settle disputes between nations. Died, 1894.

Field, Eugene, American poet and journalist, was born at St. Louis, Mo., 1850. He moved to New England, but was educated later in Missouri. He entered journalism at the age of twenty-three, ten years later becoming editor of the "Sharps and Flats" column of the Chicago Daily News. His humorous sayings therein during the following decade established his reputation in newspaper work. He was an author and poet of rare sympathy, his poems of childhood exhibiting rare qualities of appreciation and power of expression, and gaining for him the title, "The Child's Poet." Among his works are: The Denver Tribune Primer; Culture's Garland; Love Affairs of a Bibliomaniac; Little Book of Western Verse; With Trumpet and Drum, etc. He died in 1895.

Field, Marshall, merchant, philanthropist, was born at Conway, Mass., 1835. He spent his boyhood on a farm; studied at academy until 1852, and then became a dry goods clerk at Pittsfield, Mass., 1852–56; in Chicago, 1856–60. He was junior partner, 1860–65, then senior partner in house, which became, 1865, Field, Palmer, and Leiter. Potter Palmer retired, 1867, and Levi Z. Leiter, 1881, Field becoming head of Marshall Field and Company, now having the largest wholesale and retail dry goods business in the world. Founded, with gift of $1,000,000, the Field Columbian museum of Chicago; gave money and land to the amount of $450,000 to university of Chicago. Twice married; second time in London, 1905, to Mrs. Delia Spencer Caton, of Chicago. Died in 1906, leaving an immense fortune.

Field, Stephen Johnson, American jurist, was born at Haddam, Conn., 1816, son of David Dudley Field. He studied law and took up its practice in California. Chief-justice of California, 1859–63; associate justice of the United States supreme court, 1863–97. He was a member of the electoral commission, 1877, which decided the presidency in favor of Rutherford B. Hayes. Died at Washington, 1899.

Fielding, Henry, famous English novelist, was born near Glastonbury, England, 1707. He was early sent to school at Eton, and afterward to the university of Leyden. On his return from Leyden he commenced writing for the stage, and for ten years was a prolific play-writer. In 1737 he entered as a student of the Middle Temple, and in 1740 was admitted to the bar; but his new profession not proving remunerative he returned to literature, and in his remaining years produced the works with which his name is now principally associated. Chief of these are Joseph Andrews; The History of Jonathan Wild; Tom Jones; and Amelia. Unfortunately, all Fielding's works are offensive on account of coarseness, but their genius, and especially their humor, are undeniable. In his later years he received a pension, and was appointed a justice of the peace, in return for the loyalty to the Hanoverian succession which he evinced in a publication called The Jacobite Journal; but illness, the result of early dissipation, drove him at last to Lisbon, where he died in 1754.

Fielding, William Stevens, Canadian statesman and journalist, former minister of finance in the Canadian cabinet, was born at Halifax, Nova Scotia, 1848. He was educated at Halifax; D. C. L., Acadia university; LL. D., Queen's, McGill and Dalhousie universities. For twenty years he was connected with the Halifax Morning Chronicle; represented city and county of Halifax in the provincial legislature, 1882–96; member of the provincial cabinet a few months after his election, and prime minister, 1884–96, when he resigned to become minister of finance in the cabinet of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. As minister of finance was particularly charged with the readjustment of the Canadian tariff. He was a representative of Canada at the colonial conference, London, 1902; one of his majesty's plenipotentiaries for the negotiation of the Franco-Canadian commercial treaty, Paris, 1907. He also represented the electoral district of Shelburne and Queen's in the Dominion parliament, 1896-1911.

Fiesole, Fra Giovanni Da. See Angelico, Fra.

Figueras (fē-gä'-räs), Estanislao, Spanish statesman, was born at Barcelona, 1819. For taking part in republican plots in 1866 he was imprisoned; but after the expulsion of Isabella he became a member of the republican government. On the abdication of King Amadeus in 1873 he became president of the Spanish republic, but resigned soon after. He died in Madrid, 1882.

Fildes (fīldz), Sir Luke, English painter, was born at Liverpool, England, 1844. He received a private education; studied at South Kensington art schools and royal academy, London; illustrator of books and magazines for several years; afterward painted English and Venetian subjects; latterly portraits. Among his paintings are: "Fair, Quiet, and Sweet Rest"; "The Casual Ward"; "The Return of the Penitent"; "The Widower"; "The Village Wedding"; "Venetian Life"; "The Al Fresco Toilette"; "The Doctor"; "The State Portrait of the King"; "The State Portrait of the Queen," etc. He was elected R. A. in 1887.

Fillmore, Millard, American statesman, thirteenth president of the United States, was born in Summerhill, N. Y., 1800. He was apprenticed to a wool carder, but became a clerk in a judge's office; removed to Buffalo, N. Y., 1823, and then found entrance to the bar. He entered congress in 1832, was appointed chairman of the committee of ways and means in 1840, and was author of the tariff in 1842. He became comptroller of the state of New York in 1847, was elected vice-president of the United States in 1848, and succeeded to the presidency on the death of General Taylor in 1850. By signing the act for the surrender of fugitive slaves he brought about the utter defeat of the whig party in 1852. In 1856 he was nominated for the presidency, but received only scanty support. Died, 1874.

Finch, Francis Miles, jurist and poet, was born at Ithaca, N. Y., 1827. He was graduated at Yale, 1849, studied law and entered upon its practice at Ithaca. In 1880 he was appointed to the New York court of appeals to fill a vacancy, and in the following year elected for the term of 1881–95. He assisted materially in the organization of Cornell university, of which he was an original trustee. In 1892 he became dean of the Cornell law school. Besides some legal compilations he wrote numerous poems, including Nathan Hale and The Blue and the Gray. The latter poem, published in 1867, did much toward healing the breach between the North and the South. Died, 1907.

Finck, Henry Theophilus, author, musical critic of New York Evening Post since 1881, was born at Bethel, Mo., 1854. He was graduated at Harvard in 1876; resident graduate, Cambridge, 1877-78, studying sociology; studied psychology at Berlin, Heidelberg, Vienna, 1878–81. As musical critic, he is a special partisan of Wagner, Chopin, Liszt, Grieg, MacDowell. He is also the originator of the theory that romantic love is a modern sentiment, unknown to savages and the ancient civilized nations. Author: Romantic Love and Personal Beauty; Chopin, and Other Musical Essays; Pacific Coast Scenic Tours; Spain and Morocco; Wagner and His Works; Lotos Time in Japan; Pictorial Wagner; Anton Seidl; Primitive Love and Love Stories; Songs and Song Writers; Fifty Mastersongs; Fifty Schubert Songs; Edvard Grieg, etc.

Finlay, George, distinguished English historian, was born at Faversham, Kent, 1799, of Scotch parents. He received a university training at Glasgow and Göttingen, and in 1822 went to Greece, where he met Byron and fought in the war of independence. Henceforth Greece became his home, and there, after an unavailing effort to promote agriculture, he betook himself to a studious life and to writing the history of his adopted country; his valuable history, published in various parts, traces the national life of Greece from 146 B. C. to A. D. 1864. Died at Athens, 1875.

Finley, John Huston, educator, was born at Grand Ridge, Ill., 1863. He was graduated at Knox college, 1887; studied at Johns Hopkins, 1887–89; hon. Ph. D., LL. D. He was secretary of state charities aid organization, New York, 1889–92; founder and editor of State Charities Record and The Charities Review of New York. President of Knox college, 1892–99; editor of Harper's Weekly and McClure's Magazine, 1899-1900; professor of politics, Princeton, 1900–03; president of college of the city of New York since 1903. Co-author with Richard T. Ely: Taxation in American States and Cities.

Finley, Martha, "Martha Farquharson," author, was born at Chillicothe, Ohio, 1828. She was educated in the schools of Philadelphia, after which she became a teacher. She is well known for her numerous Sunday school books, and especially for the twenty-eight "Elsie Books," and a companion series of seven, the "Mildred Books"; also, Wanted — A Pedigree; Signing the Contract; The Thorn in the Nest, etc. Died, 1909.

Great Northern railway, May to September, 1896; second vice-president of Southern railway, 1896–1906; president of same since December, 1906.

Finney, Charles Grandison, American clergyman and educator, was born in Connecticut, 1792. He began to preach in the Presbyterian church in 1824, and was very successful as an evangelist. In 1835 he became professor of theology at Oberlin college, and from 1851 to 1866 was president of that institution. He was an abolitionist and an advocate of total abstinence. He published Lectures on Revivals, Sermons, Theology, etc. Died at Oberlin, Ohio, 1875.

Firdausi (fēr-dou′-sē), or Firdusi (fēr-dŏŏ′-sē), pseudonym of Abu ’l Kasim Mansur, the great poet of Persia, born near Tûs, in Khorassan, about 940. He spent thirty years in writing the Shah Namah, or Book of Kings, a national epic, but, having been cheated out of the reward promised by Sultan Mahmud, he gave vent to bitter satire against his royal master and fled from the court. For some time he led a wandering life, until at length he returned to his birthplace, where he died about 1020.

Fischer, Emil, a noted German chemist, was born at Euskirchen, 1852. Educated at Strassburg. Formerly professor at Munich, Erlangen, and Würzburg respectively. Professor of organic chemistry at university of Berlin since 1892. The synthetic production of the simple sugars and the complete demonstration of their chemical constitution is his most important achievement. His Anleitung zur Darstellung organischer Präparate is a work well known to every student of organic chemistry. Received, in 1902, Nobel prize for distinguished research in chemistry.

Fischer, Ernst Kuno Berthold, German historian of philosophy, was born at Sandewalde, Silesia, 1824. As a student of Erdmann at Halle he was smitten with the love of philosophy, and gave his life to the study of it. After graduating he went to Heidelberg and there established himself as a private lecturer, in which capacity he was eminently successful, but in 1853 was deprived of his status by the government, probably on account of the alleged pantheistic trend of his teaching. In 1856, however, he was elected to the chair of philosophy in Jena, and sixteen years later was called back to Heidelberg as Zeller's successor. His chief work is a History of Modern Philosophy. Died, 1907.

Fish, Hamilton, American statesman and diplomat, was born at New York in 1808. He graduated at Columbia in 1827, and, admitted to the bar, was elected congressman in 1842, lieutenant-governor of the state in 1847, governor in 1848, and in 1851 a member of the United States senate. As secretary of state under Grant from 1869 to 1877, he signed the Washington treaty of 1871, and completed the settlement of the Alabama question. Died, 1893.

Fisher, John, bishop of Rochester, was born about 1459 at Beverley, Yorkshire, England. In 1483 he entered Michaelhouse, now part of Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow in 1491, and master in 1497. In 1502 Margaret, countess of Richmond, Henry VII.'s mother, made him her chaplain and confessor; and in 1503 he was appointed first Lady Margaret professor of divinity. Next year he was elected chancellor of the university, and consecrated to the see of Rochester. He zealously promoted the new learning, and advocated reformation from within; as zealously he resisted the Lutheran schism. In 1527 he pronounced firmly against the divorce of Henry VIII.; and, having lent too ready an ear to the "revelations" of the holy maid of Kent, Elizabeth Barton, in 1534 he was attainted of treason, and, for refusing the oath of succession, was sent with More to the Tower. In May, 1535, Pope Paul III. made him a cardinal; on June 17th the old man, worn by sickness and ill-usage, was tried for denial of the king's supremacy; on the 22d he was beheaded on Tower hill.

Fitzgerald, Edward, English scholar, was born at Bredfield house in Suffolk, 1809. He entered Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took his degree in 1830. With the exception of periodical visits to London, he led a quiet country life, his chief amusements gardening and yachting. He published anonymously his dialogue on youth, Euphranor, 1851, which was followed by Polonius in 1852. A translation of six of Calderon's dramas was soon withdrawn from circulation. About this time he took up Persian, and in 1856 published an anonymous version of Jámí's Salámán and Absál. The quatrains of Omar Khayyám were then little known, but Fitzgerald at once recognized their beauty, and his and Omar's names will remain indissolubly linked together through his rendering of them. Died, 1883.

Fitzgerald, Lord Edward, Irish revolutionist, was born in 1763, son of the duke of Leinster. After a brief service in the British army during the American war, he entered the Irish house of commons in 1784, where he joined the party in opposition. In 1791-92 he visited France, fraternized with the leading republicans, and married the reputed daughter of the Duc d'Orleans and Mme. de Genlis. In 1796 he joined the "society of united Irishmen," became its agent in France, and promoted the insurrection of 1798. Arrested on a charge of high treason, he died in prison, 1798.

He died at Rome, 1864.

Flaubert (flō'-bâr'), Gustave, French novelist, was born at Rouen, 1821. After long hesitation between medicine and literature, he chose literature, beginning with poetry, which he soon gave up for prose. Flaubert's life was extremely uneventful; in his youth some obscure form of brain-disease to some extent arrested his intellectual development. He was a very late producer, and his works, when they did appear, were marked by a strong and morbid idiosyncrasy. His works include Madame Bovary; Salammbô; L'Éducation Sentimentale; La Tentation de St. Antoine; Le Candidat; Trois Contes, and Bouvard et Pécuchet. Died, 1880.

Flaxman, John, greatest of English sculptors, was born at York, 1755. At the age of fifteen he became a student in the royal academy, but never worked in the studio of any master. He was elected an associate of the royal academy in 1797, royal academician in 1800, and in 1810 was appointed professor of sculptor to that institution. Of his sculptures, the best known in England are his monument to the poet Collins at Chichester, the monument to Lord Mansfield, and that to the Baring family at Micheldean church, Hampshire. His model for the shield of Achilles, taken from the eighteenth book of the Iliad, is one of the finest achievements of modern art. He produced two series of outline illustrations of Homer and Æschylus, a series of illustrations of Dante, and also one of scriptural compositions. Died, 1826.

Fletcher, Andrew, Scotch patriot and publicist, was born in Saltoun, East Lothian, 1655. After some years of travel he sat in the Scottish parliament in 1681, and offered so determined an opposition to the measures of the duke of York that he had to flee to England, and thence to Holland. Here he formed fast friendship with the refugee English patriots, and on his return to England in 1683 shared the counsels of Russell, Sidney, and others. After the Rye-house plot, Fletcher fled to Holland, returned as a volunteer with Monmouth, but having shot the mayor of Lyme in a quarrel, fled to Spain, was imprisoned, but delivered. He fought in Hungary against the Turks, and returned to Scotland at the revolution. His orations in the Scottish parliament still glow with eloquence, and carry the stamp of genuine sincerity. After the union of Scotland with England, he retired in disgust from public life, devoting himself to promoting agriculture. He died at London in 1716.

He was a nephew of Corneille, the great tragic poet, and in 1699 was appointed perpetual secretary of the academy of sciences. His reputation rests chiefly upon Dialogues of the Dead, Discourse on the Plurality of Worlds, and an Essay on the Geometry of the Infinite. His long life, extending over nearly one hundred years, was filled with literary activities, and, as a man of the world, his brilliant, though somewhat cynical wit, gave him a great reputation among his contemporaries. Died, 1757.

Foote, Andrew Hull, American naval officer, was born in New Haven, Conn., 1806. Entering the United States navy in 1822, he became a commander in 1852, saw service in China in 1856, and, after the outbreak of the civil war, acted with signal credit in the reduction of Forts Henry and Donaldson, 1862. In the same year he was promoted to rear-admiral. Died, 1863.

Foote, Mary Hallock, author, artist, was born in Milton, N. Y., 1847. She married Arthur D. Foote, a civil engineer, and lived some years in Colorado, Idaho, and California. Studied art in New York; has done much work in black and white for magazines and book illustration. Author: The Led Horse Claim; John Bodewin's Testimony; The Last Assembly Ball; The Chosen Valley; In Exile, and Other Stories; Cœur d'Alene; The Cup of Trembling, and Other Stories; The Little Fig Tree Stories; The Prodigal; The Desert and the Sown; A Touch of Sun, and Other Stories.

Foraker (fŏr'-ȧ-kẽr), Joseph Benson, lawyer, jurist, United States senator, 1897–1909, was born in 1846, on farm near Rainsboro, Highland county, Ohio. Enlisted July 14, 1862, in the 89th Ohio volunteer infantry, and served to end of war, becoming first lieutenant and brevet captain; graduated at Cornell, 1869; admitted to bar and began practice at Cincinnati, 1869; judge of superior court, Cincinnati, 1879–82; resigned on account of ill-health; republican candidate for governor of Ohio, 1883; defeated, but elected governor in 1885 and 1887; again defeated, 1889, for same office; chairman of republican conventions, Ohio, 1886, 1890, 1896, 1900; delegate-at-large from Ohio republican national conventions, 1884–1904; in conventions of 1892 and 1896, served as chairman of committee on resolutions, and as such reported the platform each time to the convention; presented name of William McKinley to the conventions of 1896 and 1900 for nomination to the presidency. He was elected to the United States senate in 1896, reëlected in 1902, and served as one of the conspicuous members of that body until 1909.

Forbes, Archibald, British war correspondent, special correspondent of the London Daily News, was born at Boharm Manse, Keith, Scotland, 1838. He was for some years in the royal dragoons, but in 1870-71 went through the Franco-German war as war-correspondent; and thenceforward, whether in Spain with the Carlists, in Cyprus, in the Russo-Turkish campaign, or in the Zulu war of 1879, he accustomed the British public to expect feats of unexampled audacity, swiftness, tact, and pluck in securing and transmitting his vivid notes of events at the front. He lectured in Great Britain, America, and Australia, and wrote Drawn from Life; Glimpses Through the Cannon Smoke; Chinese Gordon; Studies of War and Peace; Napoleon III., etc. Died, 1900.

Forbes-Robertson, Johnston, English actor, was born in London in 1853. He was educated at Charterhouse, London, at Rouen, and at the royal academy of arts. Actor from the age of twenty-one; eventually the leading actor at Bancroft's and Hare's theaters, in London. He has been theatrical manager since 1896. His first success was the part of Sir Horace Welby in Forget-me-not. He subsequently played Romeo, Hamlet, and Macbeth in a most impressive manner. He was the chief support of Mrs. Patrick Campbell in her tour of the United States. Appeared in Passing of the Third Floor Back in London and America, 1908-11.

Ford, John, English dramatist, was born at Ilsington, Devonshire, 1586; studied at Exeter college, Oxford, and entered the Middle Temple in 1602. His first work was an elegy on the earl of Devonshire, entitled Fame's Memorial. Among those following were: Honour Triumphant; An Ill Beginning Has a Good End; The Lover's Melancholy; The Broken Heart; Love's Sacrifice; The Chronicle History of Perkin Warbeck; The Fancies Chaste and Noble, and The Lady's Trial. His two great tragedies, 'Tis Pity and The Broken Heart, are not far inferior to Webster's masterpieces. Died, 1639.

Ford, Paul Leicester, American author, was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., 1865. He was educated privately, owing to physical deformity, and early devoted himself to literature. Author: The Honorable Peter Stirling; The True George Washington; The Many Sided Franklin; Janice Meredith; Wanted: A Chaperon, etc. Died at New York, 1902.

Fordney, Joseph Warren, lawyer, congressman, was born in Blackford county, Ind., 1853; received a common school education, living with his parents on a farm until sixteen years of age; removed to Saginaw, Mich., 1869; began life in the lumber woods, logging and estimating pine timber, thus acquiring a thorough knowledge of the pine land and lumber industry, which has occupied his attention since; was vice-president of the Saginaw board of trade; elected alderman in 1895 and reëlected in 1897; has served as member of congress continuously since 1899.

Forgan, James Berwick, financier, president of First national bank, Chicago, was born at St. Andrews, Scotland, 1852. He was educated at Madras college and Forres academy, Scotland. His first employment was with the royal bank of Scotland for about three years; later with bank of British North America, with assignments to Montreal, New York, and Halifax; was later paying teller, afterward inspector of agencies, bank of Nova Scotia; established agency in Minneapolis, of which he was manager for three years. About 1888 he became cashier and manager of the Northwestern national bank; came to First national bank, Chicago, as vice-president, 1892. He succeeded Lyman J. Gage as president of the latter.

Forrest, Edwin, celebrated American actor, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., 1806. He went on the stage at fourteen, and finally made his way to New York, where his rendering of Othello at the age of twenty raised him to the front rank among actors. He made three tours in England, but during his last in 1845 he entirely lost the popular favor through his conduct in an embittered quarrel with Macready. After his final appearance on the stage in 1871 he continued for a short time to give Shakespearian readings. In the parts of Richard III., Macbeth, and Othello, his acting was of the highest order, and in his profession he amassed a large fortune. He built a stone castle on the Hudson, now a Catholic convent, and established an asylum for aged and indigent actors. He left a splendid library exceedingly rich in Shakespearean literature, which was destroyed by fire in 1873. Died, 1872.

Forster, John, English political and historical writer, was born at Newcastle, 1812. He was educated for the bar, but in 1832 became the dramatic critic of the True Sun. His political articles in the London Examiner attracted attention; and he edited successively the Foreign Quarterly Review, the Daily News, and, 1847–56, the Examiner. He was the author of many admirable biographical and historical essays: Lives of the Statesmen of the Commonwealth; Debates on the Grand Remonstrance; Arrest of the Five Members, and Sir John Eliot, a Biography. His literary memoirs are Life and Times of Goldsmith; Landor; Life of Dickens, and a Life of Swift. He was appointed secretary to the commissioners in lunacy in 1855, and commissioner in 1861. He died in 1876.

Forster, William Edward, English statesman, was born of Quaker parentage at Bradpole, Dorsetshire, 1818. He abandoned the bar for a post in a worsted manufactory at Burley-in-Wharfedale near Bradford. In 1861 he entered parliament for Bradford. Under-secretary for the colonies, 1865–66, he became in 1868 vice-president of the council on education and a privy-councillor. In 1870 he accepted a seat in the cabinet, and carried the elementary education bill; in 1872 he piloted the ballot bill through the commons. In 1874 he visited the United States. On Gladstone's retirement from the liberal leadership in 1875, Forster and Lord Hartington were named for the post, but Forster declined it, on the ground that he could not hope to unite the various sections of the party. That year he was elected lord rector of Aberdeen university. Under the Gladstone administration of 1880 Forster was chief-secretary for Ireland in troublous times. He was attacked unceasingly in parliament by the Irish members, and his life was threatened by the "invincibles." A land act was passed in 1881, but a coercion act seemed necessary; and when the land league issued its "no rent" manifesto, Forster proclaimed the league illegal. Parnell and several of his party were arrested. When, in April, 1882, a majority of the cabinet determined to release the suspects, Forster and Lord Cowper (the lord-lieutenant) resigned. A strong opponent of home rule, he died in London, 1886.

Forsyth (fŏr-sīth'), John, American statesman, was born in Virginia, 1780. He practiced law in Georgia, was elected attorney-general of that state in 1808, and sat in congress from 1813 to 1818, when he became United States senator. In 1819 he resigned to become minister to Spain, and negotiated the Florida cession with that country. From 1823 to 1827 he was again in congress, then governor of Georgia one term, and in 1829 was again elected senator. In 1834 he resigned and served as secretary of state under Jackson and his successor, Van Buren, until 1841. He died in 1841.

Fortescue (fŏr'-tĕs-kū), Sir John, English jurist, was born in Somerset about 1394, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford. Admitted to the bar, he was in 1441 made sergeant-at-law, and in 1442 lord chief-justice of the king's bench. Adhering to the house of Lancaster, he was accused of treason under Edward IV. He accompanied Margaret of Anjou and her son into Scotland, and there was probably appointed lord chancellor by Henry VI. In 1463 he embarked with them for Holland, and during his exile wrote his celebrated De Laudibus Legum Angliæ for the instruction of Prince Edward. On the final defeat of the Lancastrians at Tewkesbury, 1471, Fortescue submitted to Edward IV. The De Laudibus was not printed until 1537; another valuable work is The Governance of England. Died, 1476.

Fortuny (fōr-tōō'-nē), Mariano, Spanish painter, was born at Reus in Tarragona, 1839. When Spain declared war against Morocco, Fortuny followed the army, and filled his portfolios with studies of eastern life. His celebrated pictures are "The Spanish Marriage," "Book-lover in the Library of Richelieu," and "Academicians Choosing a Model." He died at Rome in 1874.

Foscari (fŏs'-kä-rē), Francesco, was born about 1372. He was named procurator to St. Mark's at Venice in 1415, and became doge of that city in 1423. His armies defeated the Turks. His son James was accused by his enemies of having assassinated Ermolao Donati, a senator, and he was in consequence sent into exile, where he died. This event caused such affliction to the doge that it drove him mad, and he was forced to abdicate in 1457. He survived his loss of power but two days.

Foss, Eugene Noble, manufacturer, governor, was born in West Berkshire, Vt., 1858; studied at university of Vermont; entered manufactory at Boston, 1882; treasurer and general manager B. F. Sturtevant and Co.; president of Becker milling machine company, Mead-Morrison manufacturing company; director of Chicago Junction railways and Union stock yards company, Brooklyn rapid transit company, Manhattan railway company, Hyde Park national bank. Elected to congress from Massachusetts, 1910, and governor of state in same year; reëlected governor 1911 and 1912. Prominent in advocacy of tariff revision and reciprocity.

Foss, George Edmund, lawyer, ex-congressman, was born at Berkshire, Franklin county, Vt., 1863. He graduated from Harvard university in 1885; attended the Columbia law school and school of political science in New York city; graduated from the Union college of law of Chicago in 1889; admitted to the bar the same year and began the practice of law in Chicago. He never held any political office until elected to the fifty-fourth congress, 1895. He subsequently represented the 7th Illinois district, 1895–1903, and the 10th district, 1903–13.

Foss, Sam Walter, poet, librarian, was born at Candia, N. H., 1858; graduated at Brown, 1882; editor, 1883–94; general writer, 1894–98; librarian, Somerville, Mass., public library, 1898-1911. Was lecturer and reader of his own poems. Author: Back Country Poems; Whiffs from Wild Meadows; Dreams in Homespun; Songs of War and Peace; Songs of the Average Man, etc. Died, 1911.

Foster, George Eulas, minister of trade and commerce, Canada, since 1911; member of parliament, North Toronto, since 1904; was born in New Brunswick, Canada, 1847; educated at the university of New Brunswick, Edinburgh university, and Heidelberg. Professor of classics, university of New Brunswick, 1872–79; entered politics, 1882, and represented Kings, New Brunswick, 1882–96; ran for York, 1896, and sat for that constituency until 1900; contested city of St. John, New Brunswick, 1900; became minister of marine in Sir John A. Macdonald's government, 1885; finance minister, 1888, in same ministry, and since under Sir John Abbott, Sir John Thompson, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and Sir Charles Tupper. He is a strong supporter of adequate protection for Canadian industries, the development of Canada by railway and steamship facilities.

Foster, John Watson, lawyer, diplomat, was born in Pike county, Ind., 1836. He was graduated from Indiana university, 1855; student one year at Harvard law school; LL. D., Princeton, Pennsylvania, Yale, Wabash college; admitted to Indiana bar, and practiced at Evansville, 1857–61; entered the Union army in 1861 as major of the 25th Indiana volunteers, and was promoted to lieutenant-colonel and colonel in Indiana regiments, and brevetted brigadier-general. After the war, editor of Evansville Daily Journal, 1865–69; postmaster, Evansville, 1869–73; minister to Mexico, 1873–80; to Russia, 1880–81. Established, 1881, in practice in international cases in Washington, representing foreign legations before commissions, arbitration boards, etc. Minister to Spain, 1883–85; special plenipotentiary to negotiate reciprocity treaties with Brazil, Spain, Germany, British West Indies, etc., 1891; secretary of state, United States, 1892-93; agent for United States in Bering sea arbitration, at Paris, 1893; invited by emperor of China and participated in peace negotiations with Japan; ambassador on special mission to Great Britain and Russia, 1897; member of Anglo-Canadian commission, 1898; agent for United States Alaskan boundary tribunal, London, 1903. Author: Biography of Matthew Watson Foster; A Century of American Diplomacy; American Diplomacy in the Orient; Arbitration and The Hague Court; The Practice of Diplomacy; Memoirs, etc.

Foster, Judith Ellen Horton, lecturer, was born at Lowell, Mass., 1840; daughter of Rev. Jotham and Judith (Delano) Horton. She was educated in New England schools and Genesee Wesleyan seminary, Lima, N. Y., 1855-56; removed to Clinton, Iowa; married E. C. Foster, lawyer, 1869. Studied law; admitted to Iowa bar, 1872, and practiced law. Became prominent in Woman's Christian temperance union; was superintendent legislative department and popular lecturer; and when that organization was affiliated with the prohibition party, identified herself with the non-partisan Woman's Christian temperance union, to whose presidency she was elected. Also well known as republican campaign orator. Author: The Crime Against Ireland. Died, 1910.

Foster, Sir Michael, English physiologist, was born at Huntington, 1836; practiced there as a surgeon, 1860–66; appointed professor of physiology at University college, London, 1869. In 1870 became lecturer on physiology at Trinity college, Cambridge, and was professor of physiology in the university, 1883–1903. His best known work is his Text-book of Physiology. He was secretary of the royal society, 1881–1903, and represented London university in parliament from 1900 to 1906. He died in 1907.

Foster, Murphy J., lawyer, ex-United States senator, was born at Franklin, La., 1849; graduated at Cumberland university, Lebanon, Tenn., 1870, and from the law school of Tulane university, New Orleans, 1871. Afterward engaged in law practice at Franklin, La. In 1879 he was elected a member of the senate of Louisiana, and was returned for three consecutive terms of four years each; president pro tempore of the senate, 1888–90; led the anti-lottery fight in the legislature in 1890; governor of Louisiana, 1892–1900; United States senator from Louisiana, 1901–13.

Foster, Stephen Collins, American song writer, was born in Pittsburgh, Pa., 1826. He first wrote negro melodies, "Old Uncle Ned," and "Oh, Susanna," which immediately gained a wide popularity. On the song "Old Folks at Home" he made $15,000. "Nelly Bly," "My Old Kentucky Home," and "O Boys, Carry Me 'Long," were just as popular. He wrote more than one hundred songs, most of which have been translated into other languages. He died in New York, 1864.

Foucault (fo͝o'-kō'), Jean Bernard Léon, French physicist, was born at Paris, 1819. From 1855 he held an appointment in the Paris observatory. He demonstrated the rotation of the earth by means of a graduated disk, invented the gyroscope and introduced physics into the study of astronomy. Died, 1868.

Fouché (fo͞o'-shā'), Joseph, duke of Otranto, French revolutionist and statesman, was born near Nantes in 1763. In 1792 he obtained a seat in the national convention, and on the trial of Louis XVI. voted for death without appeal. He became president of the Jacobins in 1794, but lost that situation through the fall of Robespierre, when he was imprisoned as a dangerous terrorist. At a later period he became Napoleon Bonaparte's minister of police, and in 1809 was created duke of Otranto. He incurred Bonaparte's displeasure by using on one occasion these words — "Let us prove that Napoleon's presence is not necessary to repel our enemies." Subsequently, Bonaparte having returned from Elba, Fouché again became minister of police. He advised Bonaparte to abdicate after the battle of Waterloo, was placed at the head of the provisional government by the chambers, and negotiated with the allies. He was sent as ambassador to Dresden. In 1816 he was deprived of his estates. Died, 1820.

Foulke (fōlk), William Dudley, author, publicist, was born in New York, 1848. He was graduated from Columbia, 1869, and Columbia law school, 1871. Removed to Indiana, 1876; member of state senate, 1883–85; formerly president of Indiana civil service reform association, American woman's suffrage association, American proportional representation league; chairman of suffrage congress, World's Columbian exposition, 1893. United States civil service commissioner, 1901–03. Author: Slav or Saxon; Life of Oliver P. Morton; Maya, a Story of Yucatan; Protean Papers; frequent contributor to magazines on history and other subjects.

Fouqué (fo͞o'-kā'), Friedrich Heinrich Karl de la Motte, famous German novelist and poet, was born in Brandenburg, 1777. When young he was a soldier and fought against Napoleon, but his health obliged him to leave the army. He then gave himself up to study, and wrote many charming stories. Undine and Sintram are the best; they are read and loved by both young and old. He died in Berlin, 1843.

Fourier (fo͞o'-rē-ā'), François Marie Charles, famous French socialist, was born in Besançon, 1772. He served on the Rhine during the revolutionary period, and afterward embarked in trade, at the same time earnestly studying the problem involved in the modern social system of mankind. In 1808 he disseminated his peculiar views on socialism by the publication of a work entitled A Theory of Four Movements and General Destinies, which in 1822 was reproduced in a completed form under the name of A Treatise on Domestic and Agricultural Association. A supplement to it appeared later, styled The New World of Industry and Society. In 1831 he established a newspaper called the Phalange, for the better exposition of his doctrines, whence he has been sometimes called "the Phalansterian." Died, 1837.

Fourier, Jean Baptiste Joseph, baron, celebrated French geometrician, was born at Auxerre in 1768. When eighteen years of age he filled the chair of mathematics at the military school of that place, and was named professor to the polytechnic school. He accompanied the French expedition to Egypt, where his labors were not unimportant. In 1802 he was appointed prefect of the Isère, and in 1815 of the Rhône. Being afterward displaced, he gave himself up entirely to scientific studies; was admitted in 1817 a member of the academy of sciences, and exercised with Cuvier the functions of perpetual secretary. His chief works are Annales de Physique, Théorie Analytique de la Chaleur, Récherches Statisques sur la Ville de Paris, and the Analyse des Equations déterminées. The last work is posthumous, being completed under the inspection of M. Navier, and published in Paris in 1831. He died in 1830.

Fowler, Charles Newell, lawyer, former member of congress, was born at Lena, Ill., 1852; graduated from Yale university, 1876, Chicago law school, 1878. He was a member of the United States house of representatives from New Jersey from 1895–1911, and was a prominent advocate of financial reform.

Fox, Charles James, English statesman, was born in Westminster, 1749, the third son of Henry Fox, Lord Holland, who early inducted him into gambling and the other fashionable vices, which clung to him through life. He was educated at Eton and at Hertford college, Oxford, entered parliament at the age of nineteen as member for Midhurst, and, having immediately made his mark as a debater, became a lord of the admiralty, and was in 1773 nominated lord of the treasury. However, he soon quarreled with Lord North. In 1782 he became secretary of state under Lord Rockingham, but on the latter's death, in the same year, refused to serve under Lord Shelburne. His name was struck off the list of privy councillors, and in 1797 he retired from parliamentary life to superintend the education of his nephew, Lord Holland, and to write the History of the Reign of James II. When his great rival, Pitt, formed his last administration, he wished Fox to join it, but the king gave a steady refusal. The regency, the trial of Warren Hastings, the French revolution, and the events which followed it gave ample scope to the talents and energies of Fox, and on all occasions he employed his influence to modify, if not to counteract, the policy of his great rival. He was a strenuous opponent of the war with France, and an advocate of those non-intervention views which find greater favor in our day than they did in his. On Pitt's death, in 1806, the king was at last obliged to admit him to office, and Fox became foreign secretary in Grenville's ministry. But the term of his life had nearly run out, and he had no time to realize the high expectations of his followers. His last motion in parliament was directed against the slave trade, and he died at Chiswick in 1806, a few months before the measure founded upon it passed into law. He was admittedly the first orator of his time; was also a man of wide reading, and showed himself equal to sacrifices to principle such as few statesmen have cared to make.

Fox, George, founder of the society of Friends, was born in County Leicester, England, 1624. Early adopting the peculiar tenets and manners known as Quakerism, he suffered for many years continual persecution. His leading doctrines or convictions were the futility of learning for the work of the ministry, the presence of Christ in the heart as the "inner light" superseding all other lights, and the necessity of trying men's opinions and religions by the Holy Spirit, and not by the scriptures. In 1655 he was brought to London and examined before Cromwell, who quickly saw that there was nothing in Quakerism to excite his apprehensions, and pronounced the doctrines and the character of its founder to be irreproachable. In 1671 he sailed for the West Indies and the American colonies, to propagate the doctrines of the sect he had originated; and on his return to England, in 1673, he was again imprisoned, but soon released through the influence of William Penn. After the accession of William III. to the throne, the public worship of the society of Friends became tolerated and legalized. He died in London, 1691.

Fox, John, Jr., American novelist, was born in Kentucky, 1863, and was graduated from Harvard in 1883. After some experience in journalism, he traveled in southern states and California, and afterward engaged in business at Cumberland Gap, where he had ample opportunity for the study of mountain life. Author: A Mountain Europa; A Cumberland Vendetta; Hell-for-Sartain; The Kentuckians; Crittenden; Blue Grass and Rhododendron; The Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come; Following the Sun Flag; Knight of the Cumberland; The Trail of the Lonesome Pine, etc.

Foxe, John, English martyrologist, was born at Boston, in Lincolnshire, 1516. At sixteen he entered Brasenose college, Oxford, and was a fellow of Magdalen, 1538–45; was tutor to the son of the earl of Surrey, executed in 1547. During the reign of Mary he retired to the continent, where he met Knox, Grindal, and Whittingham. On Queen Elizabeth's accession he was pensioned by his old pupil, the duke of Norfolk, and received a prebend of Salisbury cathedral, 1563. He lived chiefly in London, and often preached. For a year he held a stall at Durham, but was debarred from further preferment by objection to the surplice. He published numerous books, but the one upon which his fame rests is popularly known as Foxe's Book of Martyrs. Died, 1587.

Fragonard (frȧ'-gō'-när'), Jean Honoré, French painter, was born at Grasse, 1732, and gained the prix de Rome in 1752. In 1765 he received 2,400 francs from Louis XV. for his "Callirrhoe," commissioned for reproduction in Gobelins tapestry. He painted, with a loose touch and luscious coloring, genre pictures of contemporary life, and is also known by his landscapes. He is represented in the Louvre by such works as "Bacchante Endormie" and "La Chemise Enlévee." Died, 1806.

France (fräɴs), Jacques Anatole Thibault, French author, member of French academy, was born in Paris, 1844, and educated at Collège Stanislaus. Author: Le Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard; La Rôtisserie de la reine Pédauque; La Lys Rouge; L'Etui de nacre; Balthazar; Thaïs; La Vie Littéraire; Le Mannequin d'Osier; Vie de Jeanne d'Arc, and many other books. Received Nobel prize for literature, 1912.

Francia (frän'-sē-ä), José Gaspar Rodriguez, dictator of Paraguay, was born near Asuncion, about 1757. He studied theology, took his degree as doctor, and was a professor of divinity. Next he practiced law for thirty years with a high reputation. He was past fifty when the revolution which shattered the Spanish yoke in South America broke out. He took a leading part in the movement in Paraguay, and on the declaration of independence in 1811 became secretary of the national junta, in 1813 one of the two consuls, and in 1814 dictator — first for three years, and then for life. Under his firm rule, which excluded all foreign intercourse, Paraguay rapidly improved. Though politically despotic, he improved agriculture, promoted education, repressed superstition, and enforced strict justice in his law-courts, however little he regarded it for himself. Died, 1840.

Francis I., king of France, was born at Cognac, France, 1494, and became king in 1515. His first act was to reconquer Milan. Charles V., Henry VIII., and the pope were in alliance against him, driving his troops out of Italy and invading France on the north. Taken prisoner at the battle of Pavia, 1525, Francis was kept a year at Madrid, gaining his freedom only by renouncing Flanders, Artois, the duchy of Burgundy, and all his Italian possessions. His struggles with Charles V. continued until the peace of Crespy, 1544. His reign is marked by the French renaissance, the beginning of the Protestant reformation, and the strengthening of the power of the monarchy. He fostered learning and art, invited painters and scholars to his kingdom, founded libraries, opened schools, and built several of the finest palaces in France; but his persecution of the Vaudois has left a stain on his memory. He died in 1547.

Francis I., emperor of Germany, was born in 1708, eldest son of Leopold, duke of Lorraine. On the death of his father, 1729, Francis succeeded him in the dukedom, which, in 1735, he ceded to Stanislaus Leszczynski, father-in-law of Louis XV., to revert after his death to the crown of France. In 1736 he married Maria Theresa of Austria, the only daughter and heiress of the emperor Charles VI. In 1740 Charles died, and Maria Theresa succeeded him; she made her husband co-regent with herself, but gave him little share in the administration. Francis fought bravely for his wife's rights in the wars carried on against Frederick the Great. In 1745 he was elected to the once important dignity of emperor of Germany, and crowned at Frankfurt. The famous seven years' war, 1756–63, now broke out between Austria and Prussia; but the cares which it imposed fell mainly upon his leonine consort, Maria Theresa. Francis died at Innsbruck, 1765. His son Joseph succeeded him.

Francis II., emperor of Germany, and I. of Austria, was born at Florence, Italy, 1768, and succeeded his father, Leopold II., in 1792. His reign was a series of wars against Napoleon, in which, with the exception of the last, he was beaten. In 1806 he formally abdicated the crown of the holy Roman empire. Although narrow-minded, Francis was a popular ruler. He died at Vienna, 1835.

Francis Ferdinand of Austria, archduke, son of the late archduke Charles Louis, by his second marriage with the princess Maria Annonciata, daughter of Ferdinand II., king of the Two Sicilies, was born at Gratz, 1863. Until recently he has been a conservative figure in Austrian society, and, of course, holds aloof from politics because of his position. By the death of Crown Prince Rudolph and the abdication of his father, who died in 1896, he became the heir apparent to the Austrian throne. On July 1, 1900, he contracted a morganatic marriage with Countess Sophia Chotek, a member of one of the noblest Austrian families, and formally declared that neither his wife nor any children of the marriage could have the rights of equal birth or any claim to succeed to the throne. Before the ceremony the emperor made the bride Princess von Hohenberg.

Francis Joseph Charles, emperor of Austria and king of Hungary, was born in 1830, son of the archduke Francis Charles, and grandson of the emperor Francis I., and nephew of the emperor Ferdinand I. The revolution of 1848 compelled Ferdinand to abdicate, and his brother resigning his claims to the throne in favor of his own son, the latter was at the early age of eighteen called to rule an empire shaken by civil war. He took part in the campaign against the Hungarians, and was present at the capture of Raab in June, 1849. Restored to the mastery of his dominions, he proceeded to undo the work of 1848. The Hungarian constitution was suspended, the absolute authority of the Habsburg monarchy in the Austrian dominions proclaimed, and the imperial ministers were declared responsible only to the emperor. The absolute régime was maintained during the first ten years of his reign, though his own sentiments inclined to a more liberal rule. It was not until Austria had sustained severe reverses abroad that the system fell. The demand of Napoleon III. that the question of the Lombardo-Venetian states should be referred to a European conference being refused, war was declared. The Austrians were defeated at the battle of Solferino on June 24, 1859, and the emperor was compelled to sign the treaty of Villafranca, by which all claims to Lombardy were resigned. A partial return to constitutionalism was then attempted, and representative diets were restored in the different states, but the Hungarians did not cease to demand restoration of their old national institutions in their integrity. A dispute between Austria and Prussia as to Schleswig-Holstein led to war between the two nations in 1866. Here again the Austrians were completely defeated, and were compelled to accept the North German confederation under the leadership of Prussia, and to give up Venice to Italy. After these disasters the emperor restored national self-government to Hungary, and in June, 1867, was declared king of that country. In later years the emperor's influence in foreign politics has been chiefly directed to forming a closer alliance with Germany and Italy. In 1878 the treaty of Berlin allowed Austria to occupy Bosnia and the Herzegovina. In 1887 the emperor took part in a series of military councils held to provide for the defense of Galicia against Russia. By the suicide of Crown Prince Rudolph in January, 1889, he was deprived of all hope of a direct successor, and the crown will pass, on his death, to his nephew, Francis Ferdinand, son of his brother, Charles Louis.

Francis, Charles Spencer, journalist, diplomat, was born in Troy, N. Y., 1853; graduated from Cornell university, 1877; while at college distinguished himself as an athlete and established the world's intercollegiate record for single sculls. Was secretary to his father during the latter's three years' residence at Athens as United States minister to Greece. Was officer on staff of Governor Alonzo B. Cornell, of New York. On his father's death, 1897, succeeded to editorial direction and sole ownership of Troy Times; regent of university of the state of New York, 1903–06. United States minister to Greece, Rumania, and Servia, 1900–02; ambassador to Austria-Hungary, 1906–10. Died, 1911.

He was president of the Louisiana Purchase centennial exposition of 1904, and was decorated by rulers of the principal countries of Europe and Asia.

Francis, Sir Philip, reputed author of the "Junius letters," was born in Dublin, 1740. Leaving Ireland at twelve, he entered St. Paul's school in London, and at sixteen became a junior clerk in the secretary of state's office. In 1758 he was a secretary in the expedition against Cherbourg; in 1760 he was secretary on a mission to Portugal; in 1761 he acted as amanuensis to the elder Pitt; and in 1762 he was made first clerk in the war office. In 1773 Lord North made him a member of the council of Bengal; in 1780 he fought a duel with Warren Hastings, with whom he was always at enmity, and was seriously wounded. He entered parliament in 1784, and was energetic in the proceedings against Hastings, wrote many pamphlets, was eager to be governor-general of India, and was made a K. C. B. in 1806. In 1816 John Taylor wrote a book identifying Francis with "Junius," but Francis never acknowledged having written the seventy letters, which appeared in the Public Advertiser, 1772, and were reprinted in 1812 with 113 additional letters. He died in 1818.

Francis de Sales (frăɴ'-sĭs' de săl), Saint, an eminent theologian, orator, and writer, bishop of Geneva, was born at Sales, near Geneva, 1567, died, 1622, and was canonized in 1665. Frear (frēr), Walter Francis, governor, jurist, was born in Grass Valley, Cal., 1863; graduated from Oahu college, Honolulu, 1881; Yale university, 1885; Yale law school, 1890; taught Greek, mathematics, and political economy, Oahu college, 1886–88; second judge, first circuit, kingdom of Hawaii, 1893; second associate justice of supreme court, provisional government, Hawaii, 1893; first associate justice of supreme court, republic of Hawaii, 1896; member of Hawaiian commission to recommend to congress legislation concerning Hawaii, 1898; acting chief-justice, supreme court, republic of Hawaii, 1899-1900; chief-justice, 1900–07; governor of Hawaii territory since 1907.

Frederick I., called Barbarossa or Redbeard, was born about 1121, and became emperor of Germany in 1152. His reign was a long struggle, with powerful vassals at home, and with Lombardy and the pope in Italy. He captured and razed Milan in 1162, and took Rome by storm five years later. His army was, however, smitten with the plague, and Lombardy again revolted; in 1176 he was defeated at Legnano. At home he managed his vassals by a system of conciliation, and by keeping the balance of power among them equal. He asserted his power, moreover, over Poland, Hungary, Denmark, and Burgundy. At the height of his fame and influence, he took the cross to fight against Saladin. He defeated the Mohammedans in two battles, but was himself drowned in Pisidia, 1190.

Frederick II., of Germany, son of Emperor Henry VI., was born at Jesi near Ancona, 1194. In his fourth year his father died, leaving him king of Sicily. When eighteen he wrested the imperial crown from Otto IV., and was crowned in 1215. He ardently desired the consolidation of the imperial power in Italy by reducing the pontificate to a mere archiepiscopal dignity. Crowned emperor at Rome in 1220, he devoted himself to organizing his Italian territories. He founded the university of Naples, encouraged the medical school of Salerno, patronized art and literature, and commissioned his chancellor to draw up a code of laws to suit his German and Italian subjects. He took Jerusalem in 1228, and after crowning himself king of Jerusalem, 1229, he returned to Italy, where his Neapolitan dominions had been overrun by the papal allies. During the remainder of his reign he was engaged in a harassing contest with the pope, whose hands were strengthened by the accession of the revolted Lombard cities and of several princes and towns of Germany, headed by his son, Henry. Disaster and misfortune were gathering around him, when he died at Fiorentino in 1250. Intellectually, he was perhaps the most enlightened man of his age.

Frederick II., the Great, king of Prussia. See page 466.

Frederick III., eighth king of Prussia and emperor of Germany, son of William I., was born near Potsdam, 1831. He commanded an army of 125,000 in the Austro-Prussian war of 1866, and one of 200,000 in the Franco-Prussian war of 1870. He won the victories of Weissenburg and Wörth and bore a distinguished part in the succeeding events of the war. After arousing the world's best expectations by his goodness and wisdom no less than by his bravery, he ascended the throne in 1888, during his last illness, in which he suffered as heroically as he had fought. He died when fifty-seven years old, 1888. He was succeeded by his son, William II.

Frederick VI., king of Denmark, son of Christian VII. and the princess Caroline Matilda, was born in 1768. In 1784 he was declared regent, on account of his father's incapacity. With the help of his minister, Count Bernstorff, he abolished serfdom, reformed the criminal code, removed the disabilities of the Jews, and prohibited the slave trade. By the advice of Bernstorff he strove to maintain strict neutrality in the wars of the epoch. But for refusing the demands of the English, the Danish fleet was almost destroyed in 1801, and in 1807 Copenhagen was bombarded and the fleet transferred to England. Denmark then became an ally of Napoleon, and shared his fortune. Frederick ascended the throne on the death of his father in 1808. In 1814 he was robbed of Norway, and was at last compelled to send a contingent of 10,000 men against the French. The country had become bankrupt in 1813, but by his wise measures financial order was finally restored. Died, 1839.

Frederick Charles, prince and field-marshal of Germany, was born in Berlin, 1828. He was the eldest son of Prince Charles, brother of Emperor William I. Frederick Charles entered the Prussian army when a boy, served in the first Schleswig-Holstein war, commanded the right wing in the second Danish war, and defeated the Austrians at Königgrätz in 1866. He commanded the second army in 1870, drove Bazaine back into Metz, and received the surrender of that fortress October 27, 1870. Thence he marched on Orleans, which he captured, defeated General Chanzy at Le Mans, and broke up the army of the Loire. He was known as "the red prince," from the fact that he always wore a red hussar uniform. His daughter, Louise Margaret, married the duke of Connaught, son of Queen Victoria, in 1879. Died, 1885.

Frederick William, the great elector of Brandenburg, was born in 1620. On his accession in 1640 he found the state disorganized, exhausted, and devastated by the thirty years' war. He strenuously regulated the finances, made a treaty of neutrality with Sweden, organized his army, and strove to repeople his deserted towns and villages. By the treaty of Westphalia, 1648, he recovered eastern Pomerania, Halberstadt, and Minden, with the reversion of the archbishopric of Magdeburg; and out of a quarrel between Sweden and Poland he contrived to secure the independence of the duchy of Prussia from Poland, 1657. After another fifteen years of peace, alarmed at the aggressions of Louis XIV. on the Rhenish frontier, he induced the emperor, the king of Denmark, and the elector of Hesse-Cassel to make a league against France. Incited by Louis, the Swedes invaded Brandenburg, but were defeated at Rathenow and at Fehrbellin, 1675, and driven from the electorate; still, forsaken by the emperor and the other German princes, the elector was obliged to agree to the treaty of St. Germain, 1679, by which he restored all his conquests to the Swedes on the payment to him of 300,000 crowns. From this time he devoted himself to consolidating his dominions and developing their resources. He encouraged the immigration of exiled French Protestants, Dutchmen, and other foreigners. He founded the royal library at Berlin, reorganized the universities, opened canals, established posts, and greatly enlarged Berlin. He left a well-filled exchequer and a highly organized army. He made Brandenburg virtually an absolute monarchy only less powerful than Austria. He died at Potsdam in 1688, and his son became King Frederick I. of Prussia.

Frederick William I., king of Prussia, son of Frederick I., was born, 1688, and on his accession in 1713 became embroiled in the war waged by Sweden against Russia, Poland, and Denmark, at the end of which he acquired Pomerania with Stettin. The remainder of his reign was devoted to improving the internal condition of Prussia. He was sternly practical, blunt, and determined; he despised the arts and sciences, was rigidly economical, and strict in his ideas of justice. At his death in 1740 he left a treasure of 1,350,000 pounds, and an army of more than 80,000 men, the best-disciplined force in Europe, which made Prussia fourth in military power. He fostered industry and agriculture, introduced the manufacture of woolen cloth, and settled in East Prussia 17,000 Protestant refugees from Salzburg. His rule laid the foundation upon which his son Frederick the Great built the subsequent greatness of Prussia.

Frederick William II., king of Prussia, nephew of Frederick the Great, was born in 1744. The abolition of some of his predecessor's oppressive measures made him very popular at his accession in 1786. But he soon lost the regard of his subjects by his predilection for unworthy favorites, and by the abrogation of the freedom of the press and religion in 1788. The millions his uncle left in the treasury he dissipated in a useless war with Holland. His foreign policy was weak, while he oppressed his subjects with debt and increased taxation. He acquired large areas of Polish Prussia and Silesia by the partitions of Poland in 1793 and 1795, as also Ansbach and Baireuth. He died in 1797.

Frederick William III., of Prussia, son of Frederick William II., was born in 1770. The truculent policy of Napoleon roused the spirit of the nation, and the king saw himself obliged, in 1805, to agree to a convention with Russia, the real object of which was to drive Napoleon out of Germany. By the intervention of the emperor Alexander of Russia a peace was concluded, known as the treaty of Tilsit, by which Frederick William lost the greater part of his realm, and was deprived of all but the semblance of royalty. The disastrous termination of Napoleon's Russian campaign was the turning-point in the fortunes of Prussia. The part taken by the Prussian army under Blücher in gaining the victory of Waterloo, by which Napoleon's power was finally broken, raised the kingdom from its abasement. From that time Frederick William devoted himself to the improvement of his exhausted states. He was more than once embroiled with the pope, on account of his violation of the concordat. He concluded the great German commercial league known as the Zollverein, which organized the German customs and duties in accordance with one uniform system. Died, 1840.

Freeman, Edward Augustus, eminent English historian, was born at Harborne, England, 1823. He was educated at Trinity college, Oxford. His first work was a History of Architecture, 1849. After several minor works, his most important one on the History of the Norman Conquest appeared between 1867 and 1879, and was followed by that of The Reign of William Rufus and Accession of Henry I. He also wrote histories of the Saracens and of the Ottoman power in Europe; General Sketch of European History; Growth of the English Constitution; Comparative Politics; Historical Geography of Europe; William the Conqueror; and various other works, some of a more popular character, besides many articles and reviews. In 1884 he was appointed regius professor of modern history at Oxford. Died, 1892.

Freiligrath (frī'-lĭk-rät), Ferdinand, German poet, was born at Detmold, 1810, and was led by the success of a volume of poems, published in 1838, to desert commerce for literature. In 1844 he attached himself to the democratic party, and for his radical writings had to flee to Belgium, Switzerland, and London. In 1848 he celebrated the revolution in Die Revolution and Februarklänge, and returned to Germany, where he became the leader of the democratic party. Impeached the same year for his poem Die Todten an die Lebenden, he was acquitted; but a second prosecution in 1851 compelled him to flee once more to London. He returned in 1868, and died at Cannstatt, 1876. Chief among his political poems are Ça Ira, and Neuere politische und soziale Gedichte. He translated Longfellow, Shakespeare, etc. His collected works appeared in 1870.

Frelinghuysen (frē'-lĭng-hī'-zen), Frederick, American statesman, was born in New Jersey, 1753. He raised a corps of artillery, fought in the revolutionary war, was a member of the continental congress in 1778 and 1782-83, and a United States senator in 1793–96. He died in 1804.

Frelinghuysen, Frederick Theodore, nephew of above, was born in New Jersey, 1817. He practiced law and held minor offices in New Jersey, and in 1861 became attorney-general of that state. From 1866 to 1869 he served as United States senator. In 1870 he was nominated and confirmed as minister to England, but declined the appointment. In 1871 he was again elected to the United States senate, and served until 1877. He was a strong republican, voted for the conviction of Andrew Johnson, supported the civil rights bill, and was an ardent protectionist. He was a member of the Hayes-Tilden electoral commission. In 1881 he became secretary of state in President Arthur's cabinet, and held office until his death in 1885.

Frelinghuysen, Theodore, son of Frederick, was born in New Jersey in 1787. He studied law, practiced in New Jersey, and from 1817 to 1829 was attorney-general of that state. In 1829 he was chosen United States senator, and served until 1835. Afterward he was mayor of Newark, and in 1839 became chancellor of the university of New York. In May, 1844, he was nominated for vice-president by the whigs, Henry Clay heading the ticket. In 1850 he became president of Rutgers college, which position he held until his death in 1862.

Frémiet (frā'-myĕ'), Emmanuel, noted French sculptor, was born at Paris, 1824. He studied at La Petite École, and under Rude; made drawings at the Jardin des Plantes, and later drew plates for medical works. His first sculptural work was of a fox and a gazelle. His masterpiece is an equestrian statue of Joan of Arc. His other pieces include "Gorilla Abducting a Woman," "St. Michael," "Faun and Young Bear," and "Daschshund." Died, 1910.

Frémont (frē-mŏnt'), John Charles, explorer of the Rocky mountains, was born at Savannah, Ga., 1813. For two years he taught mathematics on a warship, and in 1838 began surveying. In 1842 he crossed the Rocky mountains, and demonstrated the feasibility of an overland route across the continent. In 1843 he explored Great Salt lake, advancing to the mouth of the Columbia river; and in 1845 examined the watershed between the Mississippi and the Pacific. During the Mexican war he cleared northern California of Mexican troops, but, quarreling with his superior officers, was court-martialed, and resigned his captaincy. In 1848 he started upon a fourth expedition along the upper Rio Grande, but was compelled to return to Santa Fé, after unspeakable sufferings. In 1849 he crossed over to California, where he settled, and next year became United States senator from the new state. In 1853 he conducted a fifth expedition. In 1856 he was the republican and anti-slavery candidate for the presidency; nominated again in 1864, he withdrew in favor of Lincoln. In 1861-62 he served in the regular army as major-general, but resigned rather than serve under General Pope. He was governor of Arizona in 1878–82, and died in New York, 1890.

French, Alice, author, better known as Octave Thanet, was born at Andover, Mass., 1850, daughter of Hon. George Henry French. She was educated at Abbot academy there, but her life since then has been spent in the South and West. M., Dartmouth college; studied art with William Rimmer in Boston, and with Thomas Ball in Florence, Italy; occupied a studio in Washington, 1876–78, in Boston and Concord, Mass., 1878–87, and in New York since 1887. Among his best-known works are: "The Minute Man of Concord," at Concord, Mass.; a statue of General Cass, in the capitol at Washington; statue of Rufus Choate, Boston courthouse; John Harvard, at Cambridge, Mass., and Thomas Starr King statues; "Dr. Gallaudet and His First Deaf-Mute Pupil," the Milmore memorial; and colossal "Statue of the Republic," at World's Columbian exposition. Received medal of honor, Paris exposition, 1900.

Freneau (frĕ-nō'), Philip, American poet, was born in New York city, 1752. He was of French descent, and was graduated at Princeton in 1771. In 1776 he visited the West Indies, and in 1778 went to the Bermuda islands. In 1780, during the war of the revolution, he again sailed for the West Indies, when he was captured by a British cruiser. After the return of peace Freneau became in succession editor of a newspaper, and captain of a ship that plied between New York, the West Indies, and the southern states. In 1790 he edited the New York Daily Advertiser. Under Jefferson's administration Freneau was made translator for the state department, and also became editor of the National Gazette. Later he published the Jersey Chronicle, which in 1797 was followed by the publication of the Time-piece and Literary Companion. From that time until his death he rarely came before the public. Died, 1832.

Frère (frâr), Pierre Édouard, French painter, was born at Paris, 1819. He studied under Delaroche. His paintings are mostly figures and scenes from domestic life. They are good subjects for engraving, and are well known in art stores. Ruskin was enthusiastic in praise of several of his works, which were shown in the French gallery in 1857. "The Seamstress," "Little Gourmand," "Preparing for Church," and the "Gleaner Boy" are among his best-known pictures. "Preparing for Church" is in the Corcoran gallery at Washington. He died at Écouen, 1886.

Fresenius (frā-zā'-nē-ŏŏs), Karl Remigius, noted German chemist, was born in 1818. He studied at Bonn and Giessen under Liebig, and in 1845 became professor of chemistry at Wiesbaden. The laboratory founded by him in 1848 subsequently gained great celebrity in chemical science. He was a skillful analyst, and his works have been translated into many languages. Died, 1897.

Fresnel (frā'-nĕl'), Augustin Jean, eminent French physicist, was born at Broglie, Eure, France, 1788. He was educated at the polytechnic school in Paris, and in 1816 received a permanent appointment there through the celebrated Arago. He distinguished himself by his experiments on the inflection and polarization of light, and in 1819 gained the prize offered for the best treatise explanatory of the phenomena of light. He invented the compound lighthouse lens. He died in 1827, and his works were published in 1866 by the French government.

Freund (froint), Wilhelm, German philologist, was born of Jewish parents at Kempen in Posen, 1806. He studied at Berlin and Breslau, taught at Breslau, Hirschberg, and Gleiwitz, and finally settled down at Breslau to a literary life. On his Wörterbuch der lateinischen Sprache most English-Latin dictionaries are based. Died, 1894.

Freycinet (frā'-sē'-nē'), Charles Louis de Saulce de, French statesman, was born at Foix, France, 1828. He was educated at the polytechnic school in Paris, and was originally an engineer. In 1870 he was called by Gambetta to the war department; his conduct there he described in La Guerre en Province. Elected to the senate in 1876, he became minister of public works in 1877, premier in 1879, 1882, 1886, and 1890, and in 1892 remained war minister under his successor, M. Loubet. The Panama scandal drove him to resign in 1893. He has written on engineering, sanitation, etc., and was admitted to the academy of sciences in 1887, and to the French academy in 1890.

Freytag (frī'-täk), Gustav, German novelist and dramatic writer, was born in Silesia, 1816. He studied at Breslau and Berlin, and lectured on German literature in the university at Breslau. He edited a newspaper at Leipzig, held a court position at Gotha, and during the Franco-German war was attached for a period to the staff of the crown prince. He wrote poems, successful plays, and novels. His best-known work is Debit and Credit, which has appeared in several English translations. The Lost Manuscript and a series called Our Ancestors were almost as popular, while the plays, The Valentine, and Count Waldemar, were brilliant successes. His other important works include Die Journalisten and Die Tecknic des Dramas. He died at Wiesbaden, 1895.

Frick, Henry Clay, manufacturer, philanthropist, was born in West Overton, Pa., 1849. He began business life as a clerk for his grandfather, a flour merchant and distiller; later embarked in a small way in the coke business. Was president, and since 1897 chairman of board of directors of the H. C. Frick coke company, now the largest coke producer in the world, operating nearly 40,000 acres of coal and 12,000 coke ovens, with daily capacity of 25,000 tons. He came into public notice by his vigorous management during the famous strike at Homestead, 1892, when he was several times shot and stabbed by one of the strikers. He was chairman of board of the firm of Carnegie Bros., 1889–92, chairman of board of managers of the Carnegie steel company since 1892, and is also director or officer in numerous other business enterprises.

Fröbel (frû'-bel), Friedrich Wilhelm, founder of the famous Kindergarten system, was born at Oberweissbach, Germany, 1782. He studied at Jena, Göttingen, and Berlin; served in the German army against the French, 1813-14, and founded in 1816 his school at Greisheim, which he removed, in 1817, to Keilhau, near Rudolstadt. He also founded a kindergarten at Blankenburg in 1837. His system was founded on that of Pestalozzi — under whom he worked from 1807 to 1809 — which combined physical, moral, and intellectual training, commencing with the years of childhood. His chief work is The Education of Man, Mother's Songs, Games, and Stories, etc. Died, 1852.

Frobisher (frŏb'-ĭsh-ĕr or frō'-bĭsh-ĕr), Sir Martin, famous English navigator, was born near Doncaster about 1535, and brought up to the sea. Persuaded that there was a northwest passage to the Indies, and after many fruitless efforts to enlist the merchants in his cause, he obtained in 1576 from the government of Queen Elizabeth three vessels, explored portions of the Arctic coast, and, passing through the strait which has since borne his name, he returned to England with some black ore, which was thought to contain gold, and was enabled by the queen to make two more voyages in 1577 and 1578, neither of which was crowned with fortunate results. In 1585 he went with Sir Francis Drake to the West Indies. He contributed by his gallantry toward the defeat of the Spanish armada in 1588, and received the honor of knighthood. In 1590 and 1592 he commanded squadrons with success against the Spaniards; and in 1594, being sent to the aid of Henry IV. of France with four ships of war, he was wounded, and died on his homeward voyage.

Frohman, Charles, theatrical manager, was born at Sandusky, Ohio, 1860. He was educated in the public schools of New York; was employed in the office of Daily Graphic, New York, and sold tickets evenings at Hooley's theater, Brooklyn. In 1877 he took charge of a company that was sent west to play Our Boys; was with Wm. Haverly's minstrels, 1879-80, in United States and Europe; went on road with Lady Clare and Victor Durand, 1881, but the tour was a failure. In 1888 he saw Shenandoah at Boston museum; organized a company and bought rights to that play, outside of Boston; made great success with that and succeeding ventures; organized Charles Frohman stock company, 1890; now proprietor and manager of Empire theater, Criterion, Lyceum, Garrick, Savoy, and Knickerbocker theaters, New York, and Duke of York's, Comedy, Globe and Adelphi theaters, London; also joint manager of Vaudeville theater, London.

Frohman, Daniel, theatrical manager, was born at Sandusky, Ohio, 1853. Received a common school education, and became office boy of New York Tribune, 1866. Remained in newspaper business for five years, then appeared as manager of traveling theatrical companies through the United States; manager of Fifth Avenue theater and Madison Square theater, New York, 1879–85; manager of Lyceum theater since 1885; manager of Daly's theater, New York, with the Daniel Frohman stock company; also manager of English and American stars and theatrical companies and New Lyceum theater, New York. President of actors' fund of America.

Fromentin (frō'-mäɴ'-tăɴ'), Eugène, French painter and author, was born at La Rochelle, France, 1820. He was a pupil of Rémond and Cabat; traveled in 1842–46 in Algeria, Egypt, and the East, and was made an officer of the legion of honor, 1859. He wrote the successful romances Dominique and Les Maîtres d'Autrefois. Some of his best pictures are: "Crossing the Ford," "Arabs Watering Horses," and "Encampment in Atlas Mountains." Died, 1876.

Frontenac (Fr. frôɴ'-tĕ-năk'; Eng., frŏn'-tĕ-năk), Louis de Buade, Comte de, French colonial officer, governor of Canada, was born in 1621. He served in the French army, and in 1672 was appointed governor of the French possessions in North America. He was recalled after ten years of quarreling with the Jesuits, but he had gained the confidence of the settlers and the respect of the Indians; and in 1689, when to constant attacks from the Iroquois a war with England was added, he was again sent out. He now let loose the Indians on New England villages, repulsed a British attack on Quebec, and completely broke the power of the Iroquois. He died at Quebec, 1698.

Frost, Arthur Burdett, illustrator, author, was born at Philadelphia, Pa., 1851. He was self-taught in art, and exhibited at the Paris exposition, 1900. Author: Bull Calf and Other Tales; Golfer's Alphabet; Stuff and Nonsense; Sports and Games in the Open; Book of Drawings, etc. He lives chiefly in France.

Frothingham (frŏth'-ĭng-am), Octavius Brooks, clergyman and author, was born at Boston, Mass., 1822. He was graduated at Harvard in 1843, and became pastor of a Unitarian church in Salem, Mass. In 1855 he removed to New Jersey, and in 1859 to New York, where he acted as minister of an independent religious organization for twenty years. He has written extensively on theological subjects. His chief works are: Religion of Humanity; Transcendentalism in New England; Life of Theodore Parker; Creed and Conduct, etc. Died, 1895.

Frothingham, Paul Revere, clergyman, author, was born at Jamaica Plain, Mass., 1864. He was graduated from Harvard, 1886, Harvard divinity school, A. M., S. T. B., 1889; minister of First Congregational society, New Bedford, Mass., 1889–1900; preacher to Harvard university, 1899–1902 and 1909-10; minister of Arlington Street church (Unitarian), Boston, since 1900. Author: William Ellery Channing; His Messages from the Spirit; The Temple of Virtue, etc.

Froude (frŏŏd), James Anthony, eminent English historian and general writer, professor of history at Oxford from 1892 to his death, was born at Dartington, England, 1818. He was educated at Oriel college, Oxford, and destined for the church, but abandoned this and his fellowship owing to a change of views explained in his Nemesis of Faith. His chief historical work is The History of England from the fall of Wolsey to the defeat of the Spanish Armada; he also wrote on The English in Ireland. In literature his best-known works are those on the Carlyle family, and Erasmus. He also wrote a novel, The Two Chiefs of Dunboy, and many miscellaneous works, including Cæsar; Life of Lord Beaconsfield; Life of Carlyle; Oceana, etc. His accuracy has been greatly criticised in detail, but his brilliant yet simple style, and power of presenting broad effects, have secured for his histories great influence and popularity. Died, 1894.

Fry, Sir Edward, English lawyer and jurist, was born at Bristol, England, 1827. He was educated at Bristol college, University college, London, and Balliol college, Oxford. He was made a barrister in 1854; Q. C. and bencher of Lincoln's Inn, 1869; judge of the high court, chancery division, 1877–83; lord justice of appeal, 1883–92; presided over the royal commission on the Irish land acts, 1897-98; was chairman of the court of arbitration under the metropolis water act, 1902; and was legal assessor to the international commission on the North sea incident; was chairman of the royal commission on Trinity college, Dublin, and on the university of Dublin; appointed ambassador extraordinary and first British plenipotentiary to The Hague peace conference, 1907. Author: Essays on the Accordance of Christianity with Nature of Man; The Doctrine of Election, an Essay; A Treatise on the Specific Performance of Contracts; British Mosses; Studies by the Way, etc.

Fry, Elizabeth, English philanthropist, was born near Norfolk, 1780, daughter of John Gurney, a banker. She had no deep religious opinions until, at the age of eighteen, a sermon she heard in the Friends' meeting house turned her thoughts in that direction. She began working among the poor, and founded a school for poor children, which she managed entirely herself, even when the number of scholars increased to more than seventy. She married, and later became a preacher among the Friends. In 1813 she first saw the miserable condition of the 300 women, with their children, in the Newgate prison, and her attention was turned to prison reform. By her efforts a school and manufactory were begun in the prison, an association formed to improve the prisoners, provide them with religious instruction, and a matron was appointed. Mrs. Fry visited prisons in different parts of Great Britain and on the continent, everywhere effecting ameliorations. She died at Ramsgate, 1845.

Fulton, Robert, celebrated American inventor and engineer, was born at Little Britain, Pa., 1765. He was apprenticed to a jeweler in Philadelphia at an early age, and in addition to his labors at this trade he devoted himself to painting. The sale of his portraits and landscapes enabled him, in the space of four years, to purchase a small farm, on which he placed his mother, his father being dead. At the age of twenty-two he proceeded to London, where he studied painting under West; but after several years thus spent he felt that this was not his true vocation. Accordingly, he abandoned painting and applied himself wholly to mechanics. In 1794 he obtained from the British government a patent for an inclined plane, the object of which was to set aside the use of locks; and in the same year he invented a mill for sawing and polishing marble. His next invention was a machine for spinning flax, followed by one for making ropes. He was received as a civil engineer in 1795, and wrote a work on canals in which he developed his system. Accepting an invitation from the United States minister at Paris, he proceeded to that city in 1797, and remained there for seven years, devoting himself to new projects and inventions. In 1803 he constructed a small steamboat, and his experiments with it on the Seine were attended with great success. He returned in 1806 to New York and pursued his experiments there. In 1807 he launched his steam-vessel, the Clermont, upon the Hudson, which made a successful start, in the presence of thousands of astonished spectators. From this period steamers came into general use upon the rivers of the United States. In 1815 he launched the war-steamer Fulton, and died the same year.

Funk, Isaac Kaufman, author, publisher, clergyman, was born at Clifton, Ohio, 1839. He was graduated at Wittenberg college; D. D., 1861; LL. D., 1896. Furnivall (fûr'-nĭ-val), Frederick James, English philologist, was born at Egham, Surrey, England, 1825. He was educated at University college, London, and Trinity hall, Cambridge, where he took his degree, 1846; M. A., Ph. D., Litt. D. In early life he associated himself in philanthropic work with Frederick D. Maurice, and taught in his workingmen's college every term for ten years. He devoted himself to English philology, and with characteristic energy founded the Early English text society, 1864; the Chaucer society, 1868; the ballad society, 1868; and the New Shakespeare society, 1874; was active in starting the Browning society, 1881, and the Wycliffe society, 1882. He personally edited many works, chiefly through the medium of some one of the above societies, the most important being Saint Graal; Robert of Brunne's Handlyng Synne; Walter Map's Queste del Saint Graal; Political, Religious, and Love Poems; Bishop Percy's Folio MS. of Ballads and Romances; edited jointly with J. W. Hales, Ballads from Manuscripts on the Condition of Tudor England, 1520–50, and Caxton's Book of Curteseye. His best works are his splendid edition of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, and the Century Shakespeare in 39 volumes. Died, 1910.

Fuseli (fū'-zē-lĭ), John Henry, Swiss painter, was born at Zürich in 1741. He was at first a clergyman and writer of Zürich, visited England, afterward studied art in Italy, returned to London in 1778, and executed pictures for Boydell's Shakespeare gallery. In 1799 he exhibited a series of forty-seven designs on a large scale from Milton's works, and became professor of painting in the academy. Among his literary labors were Lectures on Painting, and a translation of Lavater's Aphorisms on Man. Died, 1825.

Fustel de Coulanges (fūs'-tĕl' dē ko͞o'-läɴzh'), Numa Denis, French historian, was born at Paris, 1830. He filled chairs at Amiens, Paris, Strassburg, and from 1875 at the École Normale at Paris. After the war of 1870 he turned his attention to history, though he had written previously Chio and Polybe. His first historical work, La Cité antique, made its author famous. His Histoire des Institutions politiques de l'ancienne France is profoundly learned, and made him a member of the French institute. Died, 1889.

Fyffe (fĭf), Charles Alan, English historian, was born at Blackheath, England, 1845. In 1867 he took classical honors at Balliol college, Oxford, and was elected a fellow of University college. During the Franco-German war he was war correspondent for the London Daily News, and was in Paris during the commune. In 1880–90 he published his History of Modern Europe, in three volumes. Died, 1892.

Gabelentz (gä'-bē-lĕnts), Hans Conon von der, German philologist, was born at Altenburg, 1807. He was educated at the universities of Leipzig and Göttingen; studied the Finno-Tartaric languages, and published Éléments de la Grammaire Mandchoue; published a critical edition of the Gothic translation of the Bible by Ulfilas, with a Latin translation, and with a Gothic glossary and grammar appended. Besides he furnished contributions to periodicals on the Mordvinian and Samoyed languages. He is said to have known more than eighty languages. Died, 1874.

Gade (gä'-de), Niels Wilhelm, Danish composer, was born, lived, and died at Copenhagen, 1817–90. He was court organist at Copenhagen, and wrote several symphonies, overtures, and cantatas, as well as many choral and solo productions. His overture, Ossian, has received high praise, as have also his musical sketches, Aquarellen and Volkstänze. He was one of the originators of the Scandinavian school of music.

Gadsden (gădz'-dĕn), Christopher, American patriot, was born in Charleston, S. C., 1724. He was a member of the first continental congress, 1774, became brigadier-general during the revolution, and was lieutenant-governor of South Carolina at the time of the surrender of Charleston to Sir Henry Clinton in 1780. He died in 1805.

Gadsden, James, grandson of above, was born at Charleston, S. C., 1788. He served in the war of 1812 and against the Seminoles. In 1853 he was appointed minister to Mexico, and negotiated the purchase of part of Arizona and New Mexico, known as the "Gadsden purchase." He died in 1858.

Gage, Lyman Judson, financier, was born at De Ruyter, Madison county, N. Y., 1836. He removed to Rome, N. Y., 1848, and was educated at Rome academy; LL. D., Beloit, 1897, New York university, 1903. At seventeen he entered Oneida central bank; served as office boy and junior clerk until 1855, when he went to Chicago; clerk in planing mill until 1858; bookkeeper, 1858–61, and cashier, 1861–68, Merchants' loan and trust company; became, in 1868, cashier, in 1882, vice-president, and in 1891, president of First national bank of Chicago. Was first president of board of directors, World's Columbian exposition; three times president of American bankers' association; first president of Chicago bankers' club; twice president of civic federation of Chicago. Secretary of United States treasury, 1897–1902; president of United States trust company, New York, 1902–06. Retired, 1906. Trustee of Carnegie institution, Washington.

Gage, Simon Henry, biologist, educator, was born in Otsego county, N. Y., 1851. He was graduated at Cornell, 1877; instructor, assistant professor and full professor of Cornell, 1878-1908; studied in Europe, 1889, and is now one of the editors of American Journal of Anatomy. Author: The Microscope and Microscopic Methods; Anatomical Technology (with Professor Burt G. Wilder); and numerous papers on biological subjects; collaborator or contributor to Foster's Encyclopædic Medical Dictionary, Wood's Reference Hand-Book of the Medical Sciences, Johnson's Cyclopedia, etc.

Gage, Thomas, English general, last royal governor of Massachusetts, was born in 1721. In 1763 he was made commander-in-chief of the British forces in America. His inflexible character led the British government to regard him as well fitted to end the disturbances in the American colonies. In 1774 he was nominated governor of Massachusetts, a post of peculiar difficulties. In April, 1775, he dispatched an expedition to seize a quantity of arms which had been stored at Concord. On the way thither the detachment came upon a number of militia drilling, whom they attacked because they refused to lay down their arms. This encounter, known as the battle of Lexington, was the signal for a general rising throughout the colonies. On June 17th the battle of Bunker Hill was fought, which resulted in a dearly bought victory to the English; but numerous complaints being lodged against Gage, he was recalled by the British government in October, 1775. Died, 1787.

Gagern (gä'-gĕrn), Heinrich Wilhelm August, German statesman, was born at Bayreuth, Germany, 1799. He was educated at the military school at Munich. On Napoleon's return from Elba he entered the army of Nassau, and served as lieutenant at Waterloo. He subsequently studied law at the universities of Heidelberg, Göttingen, Jena, and Geneva; in 1821 he entered political life under the government of Hesse-Darmstadt.

He was elected a member of the second chamber in 1832, and vigorously opposed the policies of the state governments and of the federal diet. In 1836, seeing the fruitlessness of opposition to the governmental politics, he declined reëlection, and turned to agriculture on his father's estate. In 1846 he published a work against the government of Hesse; in 1847 was again elected to the chamber as representative of Worms, and was president of the Frankfort parliament, 1848-49. From 1859 he again took part in grand-ducal politics, as a partisan of Austria against Prussia. Died, 1880.

Gailor, Thomas Frank, prelate, bishop of Tennessee since 1898, was born at Jackson, Miss., 1856. He graduated at Racine college, and the General theological seminary, New York; D. D., S. T. D., Columbia, Trinity, university of the South. Rector of Pulaski, Tennessee, Episcopal church, 1879-82. Professor ecclesiastical history, 1882-90, chaplain, 1883-90, vice-chancellor, 1890-93, chancellor and president of board of trustees, university of the South, since 1908; declined bishopric of Georgia, 1890. Author of a Manual of Devotion, and many lectures and sermons.

Gainsborough (gānz'-b'rō), Thomas, eminent English landscape painter, was born at Sudbury, England, 1727. He early displayed a decided talent for painting, and began life as a portrait painter. His later genius found adequate expression in the delineation of the rich and quiet scenery of his native country, and to this he mainly devoted himself after settling in London in 1774. At the creation of the royal academy he was chosen one of the first members. Among his finest productions are "The Shepherd's Boy," "The Fight Between Little Boys and Dogs," "The Sea-shore," "The Woodman in a Storm," and "Duchess of Devonshire." The most celebrated of his pictures is "The Blue Boy," in the Devonshire gallery. Died, 1788.

Gairdner (gārd'-nēr), James, British historian, was born at Edinburgh, Scotland, 1828. He was educated at the university of Edinburgh; LL. D., Edinburgh, 1897. He became clerk in the public record office, 1846; assistant keeper of public records, 1859. Edited for master of the rolls: Memorials of Henry VII., and Letters and Papers of the Reigns of Richard III. and Henry VII.; appointed, 1879, to continue the Calendar of Henry VIII., of which vol. v. to vol. xxi. have appeared under his editorship, completing the work; edited the Paston Letters, 1872–75; edited also some volumes for the Camden society; author of England in the series Early Chroniclers of Europe; Life of Richard III.; The English Church in the Sixteenth Century to the Death of Mary; Studies in English History; contributed numerous articles to the Dictionary of National Biography and the English Historical Review. Died, 1912.

Gaius (gā'-yŭs), or Caius, Roman jurist, flourished in the second century of our era. He was the author of more than fifteen works, of which the Institutes was the most important. This is supposed to have been the first instance of a popular manual of Roman law in the sense of modern elementary text books. It was incorporated almost bodily into the celebrated Institutes of Justinian. The work was long lost, but a large part of it was recovered in 1816-17 from a much defaced palimpsest in the cathedral library at Verona, found by Niebuhr.

Galba (găl'-bȧ), Servius Sulpicius, Roman emperor, was born B. C. 3. He was of a noble and very rich family, and showed so much talent when a boy that the emperors Augustus and Tiberius both predicted that he would one day be at the head of the Roman world. He was commander of the army in Spain when the emperor Nero died, in 68 A. D., and was so popular with the soldiers that they made him emperor when seventy-one years old. But he soon began to pursue a military course of marked severity, made promises to his friends which he did not keep, and hoarded up his money like a miser. He was murdered after a reign of only seven months, in 69 A. D.

Galdós (gäl-dōs'), Benito Pérez, Spanish novelist and dramatist, was born in the Canary islands, 1845, but was brought up at Madrid. His Gloria, Doña Perfecta, Trafalgar, Léon Roch, Marianela, etc., have been translated into English, and entitle him to be classed among the most noted modern writers. His later works follow the realistic French school, and are descriptive of Spanish customs, manners, and institutions

Galen (gā'-lĕn), or Claudius Galénus, celebrated Greek physician, was born at Pergamus, in Mysia, 130 A. D. He first studied medicine at Pergamus, afterward at Smyrna, Corinth, and Alexandria. He returned to his native city in his twenty-ninth year, and was at once appointed physician to the school of gladiators. In his thirty-fourth year he went to Rome, where he stayed for about four years, and gained such a reputation that he was offered, but declined, the post of physician to the emperor. He returned to his native country in his thirty-eighth year, and had scarcely resumed his ordinary course of life when he received a summons from the emperors M. Aurelius and L. Verus to attend them in the northeastern frontier of Italy, whither they had gone to make preparations for a war with the northern tribes. He joined the camp toward the end of the year 169; but a pestilence breaking out, the emperors and their court set off for Rome, whither Galen accompanied or followed them. On the return of M. Aurelius to the seat of war Galen obtained permission to be left at Rome, alleging that such was the will of Æsculapius, as revealed to him in a dream, and the sons of M. Aurelius were intrusted to his care. The place and time of his death are alike unknown, though the latter is believed to have been 201.

Galileo (gä'-lē-lā'-ō). See page 347.

Gall (gôl; Ger., gäl), Franz Joseph, German physician, founder of phrenology, was born at Tiefenbronn, on the borders of Baden and Württemberg, 1758. In 1785 he established himself as a physician in Vienna, where for many years he carried on a series of elaborate investigations on the nature of the brain and its relation to the outer cranium. In 1796 he gave publicity to his views in a series of lectures in Vienna, which were, however, condemned as subversive of morality and religion. Being joined by Spurzheim, who adopted his theories, he undertook a lecturing tour through a large part of Europe, and eventually settled at Paris, where he published his phrenological work, Fonctions du Cerveau. His chief work, however, is his Anatomy and Physiology of the Nervous System. Died, 1828.

Gallait (gäl-lā'), Louis, Belgian historical painter, was born at Tournay, 1810; he became famous by pictures on subjects from the history of the low countries, such as "The Abdication of Charles V."; "Alva viewing the dead bodies of Egmont and Horn"; "The Plague of Tournay"; "Tasso in Prison"; "Temptation of St. Anthony"; "A Gypsy Woman and her Children," etc. He died in 1887.

Galland (gȧ'-läɴ'), Antoine, French orientalist, was born at Rollot in Picardy, 1646. Attached in 1670 to the French embassy at Constantinople, he traveled in Syria and the Levant, 1673–79. In 1709 he became Arabic professor in the Collège de France. He wrote on archæology, Eastern proverbs, and Indian fables, but is best known by his translation of the Arabian Nights. Died, 1715.

Gallatin (găl'-á-tĭn), Albert, American financier and statesman, was born at Geneva, Switzerland, 1761. He graduated there in 1779, came to the United States in 1780, taught French at Harvard, bought land in Virginia and Pennsylvania, and entered political life in 1789. In 1793 he was elected to the United States senate, but was not permitted to retain his seat on the ground of ineligibility under the constitution. In 1795 he entered congress from Pennsylvania, and in 1801–13 was secretary of the treasury. He took an important part in the peace negotiations with England in 1814, and signed the treaty of Ghent. In 1816–23 he was minister at Paris, and in 1826 at London. From 1827 he devoted his time to historical and ethnological researches, writing on finance, politics, and the Indian tribes. He was one of the founders, and the first president of the ethnological society of America. Died, 1849.

Gallaudet (găl'-ó-dĕt'), Edward Miner, educator, president of Gallaudet college for the deaf, 1864–1911, emeritus president since 1911; was born at Hartford, Conn., 1837. He was graduated at Trinity college, 1856, LL. D., 1869; also LL. D., Yale, 1895; Ph. D., Columbian, 1869; taught in his father's institution for deaf mutes, Hartford, 1856–57; organized, 1857, Columbia institution for deaf, dumb, and blind, at Washington; developed from it the Gallaudet college for the deaf, founded in 1864. President of convention of American institutions for the deaf; in 1886, at the invitation of British government, appeared before the royal commission in interest of deaf-mute education. Author: Popular Manual of International Law; Life of Thomas Hopkins Gallaudet.

Gallaudet, Thomas Hopkins, educator, philanthropist, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., 1787. He was graduated at Yale college, 1805; tutor there, 1808–10; studied at Andover theological seminary, 1811–14; licensed to preach, 1814; studied the systems of deaf-mute instruction in London, Edinburgh, and Paris, 1815–16; founded and became superintendent of the American asylum for deaf mutes at Hartford; and held the office of president of the institution, 1817–30, resigning on account of ill health. He published numerous sermons, addresses, and juvenile works, and edited six volumes of Annals of the Deaf and Dumb. Died, 1851.

Galle (găl'-lĕ), Johann Gottfried, German astronomer, was born in Prussian Saxony in 1812. He studied at Berlin, 1830–33, became director of the Berlin observatory, and shares with Leverrier the honor of discovering the planet Neptune. He afterward became professor of astronomy at Breslau. He also discovered three comets, 1839-40. He published several works on astronomy and climatology. Died, 1910.

Gallinger, Jacob Harold, physician, United States senator from New Hampshire, was born in Cornwall, Ont., 1837. He received an academic education, graduated in medicine, 1858, and practiced until he entered public life. Hon. A. M., Dartmouth, 1885. Member of New Hampshire legislature. 1872-73, 1891; member of state constitutional convention, 1876; state senator, 1878, 1879, 1880; president of state senate, 1879, 1880. Surgeon-general of state, with rank of brigadier-general, 1879-80; chairman of republican state committee, 1882–90, 1898–1907; member of congress, 1885–89. Elected to United States senate, 1891, and reëlected 1897, 1903, and 1909.

Galt (gôlt), Sir Alexander Tillock, Canadian statesman, was born at Chelsea, England, 1817, and emigrated to Canada when a boy. For many years he was commissioner of the British and American land company, and in 1849 entered the Canadian parliament as a liberal. He was finance minister from 1858 to 1862, again from 1864 to 1866. From July to November, 1867, he was finance minister of the Dominion. He was a member of the fisheries commission under the treaty of Washington, and a member of the Halifax fisheries commission. After 1857 he allied himself with the liberal-conservative party, and was considered one of the leading authorities on finances in the Dominion. He became grand commander of the order of St. Michael and St. George in 1878. He wrote Canada from 1849 to 1859. Died, 1893.

Galt, Sir Thomas, Canadian jurist, brother of the foregoing, was born in England in 1815, and educated in Scotland. He removed to Canada in 1832, and was admitted to the bar in 1845. In 1858 he became queen's counsel, in 1869 judge of the common pleas, and in 1887 chief justice of the court of common pleas. He was knighted in 1888. Died, 1901.

Galton (gôl'-tŭn), Francis, English scientist and traveler, was born near Birmingham, England, 1822; cousin of Charles Darwin. He was educated at King Edward's school, Birmingham, and King's college, London, studied medicine, and was graduated at Trinity college, Cambridge, 1844; D. C. L., Oxford, Sc. D., Cambridge. In 1846 he traveled through North Africa and on the White Nile, 1850 assisted in exploring the unknown Damara and Ovampo lands in South Africa, and soon after entered the British civil service in the board of trade. He was an officer and member of many scientific societies, and for his Narrative of an Explorer in Tropical South Africa received the gold medal of the royal geographical society. Author: Tropical South Africa; Art of Travel; Vacation Tourists; Hereditary Genius; English Men of Science, their Nature and Nurture; Human Faculty; Natural Inheritance; Finger Prints; Fingerprint Directory, and numerous Memoirs, latterly on eugenics, in 1905 establishing for its study a research fellowship in the university of London. Died, 1911.

Galvani (găl-vä'-nē), Luigi, Italian physician and physicist from whom "galvanism" derived its name, was born in Bologna, 1737. He was educated for the profession of medicine, and studied under Beccaria, Tacconi, and Galeazzi. In 1762 he was appointed lecturer on anatomy in the university of Bologna, in which city he practiced. It was while holding this lectureship that he made those discoveries, partly by means of experiments on the muscles of frogs, which he published to the world in 1791 in his treatise entitled De Viribus Electricitatis in Motu Musculari Commentarius. The now fully-established doctrine of animal electricity owes its origin to the patient and laborious investigations of the Bologna professor. Died, 1798.

Gama (gä'-mä), Vasco da, Portuguese navigator, was born about 1469 at Sines in Alemtejo. He early distinguished himself as an intrepid mariner, and was selected by King Emanuel to discover the route to India around the cape. The expedition of three vessels with 168 men left Lisbon in July, 1497, but was four months in reaching St. Helena. After rounding the cape, despite hurricanes and mutinies he made Melinda early in the following year. Here he found a skillful Indian pilot, crossed the Indian ocean, and arrived at Calicut in May, 1498. The ruler of Calicut soon became actively hostile, and Da Gama had to fight his way out of the harbor. In September, 1499, he arrived at Lisbon, and was ennobled. Emanuel immediately despatched a fresh squadron of thirteen ships under Cabral, who founded a factory at Calicut. But the forty Portuguese left there were murdered, and to avenge them the king fitted out a squadron of twenty ships under Da Gama, 1502, which founded the colonies of Mozambique and Sofala, bombarded Calicut, and reached the Tagus with thirteen richly-laden vessels in December, 1503. For twenty years Da Gama lived inactive at Evora, while the extended Portuguese conquests were presided over by five viceroys. The fifth was so unfortunate that John III. in 1524 despatched Da Gama to India, where he succeeded in making Portugal once more respected, but soon after his arrival he died at Cochin, 1524.

Gamaliel (gá-mā'-lĭ-el), St. Paul's teacher, was a prominent Pharisee, and taught "the law" early in the first century. He was the grandson of Hillel. Tolerant and peaceful, he seems to have placed Christianity on a par with other sects; and he exhorts to long-suffering on all sides.

Gambetta (găm-bĕt'-à), Léon Michel, French lawyer, statesman, and orator, was born at Cahors, 1838. He studied law, and in 1859 joined the Paris bar. It was not until 1868 that his name came prominently before the public. He then acquired fame as counsel for defendants in political prosecutions. He showed himself an able and determined enemy of the second empire. After Sedan he became minister of the interior, and remained for some time in Paris after it was invested by the Germans. As he was anxious, however, to stir up the provinces, he contrived to escape from the city by a balloon. He came down to Amiens, and thence proceeded to Tours, where he was intrusted with the control of the war department. He assumed unlimited power, and made every effort to stir up the provinces in defense of Paris. He preached war with the utmost hostility against the Germans, and denounced the capitulation of Metz as an act of treason on the part of Marshal Bazaine. When the national assembly was resolved upon in 1871, Gambetta sought by decree to give it an exclusively republican character. The decree was canceled at the instigation of Prince Bismarck, and Gambetta resigned office as minister. He subsequently entered the assembly as a member for Paris, became the leader of the extreme left, and to the violence of a speech which he delivered at Grenoble was largely attributed the reaction which set in against republican government and the retirement of M. Thiers. After this his political action became more skillful and moderate, and to his leadership the republicans greatly owed their success in the elections of 1877. He became premier in 1881, but in a few months resigned. Died, 1882.

Gambier (găm'-bēr), James, Baron, English admiral, was born in the Bahamas, 1756. He fought with distinction off Ushant, under Lord Howe, in 1794; became rear-admiral, 1795, vice-admiral, 1799, and admiral, 1805. He commanded the British fleet at Copenhagen in 1807, and was rewarded with a peerage. At the battle of Aix Roads in 1809 he disregarded the signals of Dundonald but was "most honorably acquitted" by court-martial. In 1814 he served on the commission which negotiated the treaty of peace with the United States. Died, 1833.

Gamble, Robert Jackson, lawyer, United States senator, was born in Genesee county, N. Y., 1851. He removed to Fox Lake, Wis., 1862; graduated from Lawrence university, Appleton, Wis., 1874; located at Yankton, S. D., 1875, where he has since been engaged in the practice of law. He was district attorney for the second judicial district of the territory in 1880; city attorney of Yankton for two years; state senator in 1885, under the constitution adopted that year; was elected to the fifty-fourth and fifty-sixth congresses; elected to the United States senate, 1901, and reëlected for the term 1907-13.

Gannett (găn'-ĕt), Henry, geographer and statistician, United States geological survey, since 1882, was born at Bath, Me., 1846. He was graduated from Lawrence scientific school, Harvard university; LL. D., Bowdoin; was civil and mining engineer, 1866-70; assistant Harvard observatory, 1870-71; topographer, Hayden survey, 1872-79; geographer, United States census, 1880-82, 1890-92, 1900-02; assistant director census, Philippine islands, 1902-03; assistant director census of Cuba, 1907-08. Author: Statistical Atlases of Tenth, Eleventh, and Twelfth Censuses; Scribner's Statistical Atlas (in part); Dictionary of Altitudes; Commercial Geography; Building of a Nation; United States; Stanford Series of Geography; Contour Map of United States; and many geographical and statistical reports and papers.

Garcia (gär-thē'-ā), Manuel, musical genius, was born at Seville, Spain, 1775. After acquiring a considerable reputation as a singer in Cadiz and Madrid, he went to Paris in 1808, where he obtained great success at the Italian opera; and in 1811 proceeded to Italy, where he was received with equal favor in Turin, Rome, and Naples. Subsequently, with a select operatic company, composed in part of members of his own family, he crossed the Atlantic, and visited the United States, Mexico, and South America. After his return to Paris he became a vocal teacher, and many of his pupils reached a high degree of excellence, but none equaled his eldest daughter, Maria, afterward Mme. Malibran. Died at Paris, 1832.

Garcilaso de la Vega (gär'-thē-lä'-sō dā lä vā'-gä), Spanish soldier and poet, was born at Toledo about 1503. He early adopted the profession of arms, and gained a distinguished reputation for bravery in the wars carried on by Emperor Charles V. against the French and Turks, but was mortally wounded while storming a castle near Fréjus, in the south of France. He wrote a number of sonnets and other poems, several eclogues, and is sometimes called the "Spanish Petrarch." Died at Nice, 1536.

Garcilaso de la Vega, Peruvian historian, known as "the Inca," was born at Cuzco, in Peru, about 1540. He was the son of Sebastian Garcilaso de la Vega y Vargas, who married Elizabeth Palla, a princess of the race of the Incas, and niece of the famous Huayna Capac, the last emperor of Peru. At the age of twenty he proceeded to Spain, and never again visited America. During the greater portion of his life he lived at Cordova, where he died. His first work was a History of Florida, containing an account of the conquest of the country by Hernando de Soto, and was followed by a history of the royal Incas, his largest work. Died, 1616.

Gardener, Helen Hamilton, author, was born at Winchester, Va., 1858, daughter of Rev. Alfred Griffith Chenoweth. She was graduated at Cincinnati high and normal schools; pursued post-graduate work in biology, medicine, and other branches in New York; married Col. S. A. Day, United States army, in 1901. She has done much magazine work as editor and contributor, and written many stories, essays, and scientific articles. Author: Men, Women, and Gods, essays; Facts and Fictions of Life; Is This Your Son, My Lord? Pushed by Unseen Hands; A Thoughtless Yes; An Unofficial Patriot; Historical Sketches of Our Navy, etc. She has been active in movements for progress and development of women, and for social and ethical reform.

Gardiner, Samuel Rawson, English historian, was born in 1829; was educated at Winchester and Christ Church, Oxford. In 1884 he was elected fellow of All Souls', and was for some years professor of modern history at King's college, London. His historical works include The History of England from the Accession of James I. to the Disgrace of Chief Justice Coke; Prince Charles and the Spanish Marriage; England Under the Duke of Buckingham and Charles I.; The Personal Government of Charles I.; and the Fall of the Monarchy of Charles I.; all these being republished as a continuous work in 1883-84; An Introduction to the Study of English History, with J. B. Mullinger; History of the Great Civil War; and a complete History of England. Died, 1902.

Garfield, Harry Augustus, educator, was born at Hiram, Ohio, 1863, the son of James Abram Garfield. He was graduated at Williams college, 1885; studied law at Columbia law school one year, and at Oxford, England, and Inns of Court, London, but without matriculation at either of the latter places. He practiced law as a member of the firm Garfield, Garfield, and Howe, Cleveland, 1888–1903; professor of politics, Princeton, 1903–08; elected president of Williams college, 1907, and assumed duties in June, 1908. President of Cleveland chamber of commerce, 1898–99, and member of many learned and other associations.

Garfield, James Abram, twentieth president of the United States, was born in Orange, Cuyahoga county, Ohio, 1831. As a boy he had few advantages, received a common school education, and this in a fragmentary way. He worked occasionally at a carpenter's bench, toiled early and late on the small maternal farm, and also drove a team of canal mules. By dint of hard work he persevered until he entered Williams college, Mass., and was graduated in 1856. He studied and practiced law, and was a member of the Ohio senate, 1859-60; entered the army in 1861 as colonel of the 42d Ohio volunteers; served in southeastern Kentucky, and was promoted to be brigadier-general of volunteers, 1862; served at Shiloh, Corinth, etc.; was appointed chief of staff by General Rosecrans, 1863; and for gallantry at the battle of Chickamauga was promoted to major-general of volunteers. He resigned to occupy a seat in the thirty-eighth congress, to which he had been elected, and remained in congress as chairman of important committees, until elected United States senator in the spring of 1880. He was elected to the presidency at the close of 1880, and entered upon office in the spring of the following year; but on the 2d of July he was shot by the assassin Guiteau, while at the Washington station of the Baltimore and Potomac railway, and died at Elberon, N. J., after lingering for nearly three months. His early poverty, his manly independence, his hard-won attainments, and his incorruptible integrity had all caused his career to be watched as that of a man of exceptional powers and of brilliant promise; and his untimely death was mourned, not only by his own countrymen, but by the whole civilized world. Died, 1881

Garfield, James Rudolph, lawyer, former secretary of the interior, and son of James Abram Garfield, was born in Hiram, Ohio, 1865. He was graduated at Williams college, Mass., 1885; studied at Columbia law school; was admitted to the bar in 1888; practiced law in Ohio, 1888–1902; was member of Ohio senate, 1896 to 1899; member of United States civil service commission from 1902 to February, 1903; commissioner of corporations, department of commerce and labor, from February, 1903, to March, 1907; was secretary of the interior, 1907–09.

Garibaldi (gä'-rē-băl'-dē), Giuseppe, Italian patriot, was born at Nice, France, 1807, and began life as a sailor. He associated himself enthusiastically with Mazzini for the liberation of his country, but, being convicted of conspiracy, fled to South America, where, both as a privateer and a soldier, he gave his services to the young republics struggling there for life. Returning to Europe, he took part in the defense of Rome against France, but, being defeated, fled to New York, to return to the isle of Caprera, biding his time. He joined the Piedmontese against Austria, and in 1860 set himself to assist in the overthrow of the kingdom of Naples and the union of Italy under Victor Emmanuel. Landing in Calabria, he entered Naples and drove the royal forces before him without striking a blow, after which he returned to his retreat at Caprera, ready still to draw sword, and occasionally offering it again in the cause of republicanism. In 1870-71 he commanded a French force in the Franco-German war. Died, 1882.

Garland, Hamlin, American novelist and short-story writer, was born of Scotch descent at West Salem, Wis., 1860. Until 1881 he worked on his father's farm, spent some time in Dakota, then proceeded East, where he taught English literature in private schools in Boston and its neighborhood, and published his first book in 1890. Since then he has devoted himself to lecturing and writing. Besides a collection of verse entitled Prairie Songs, he has published the following books: Rose of Dutchers Coolly; A Little Norsk; Jason Edwards; A Member of the Third House; A Spoil of Office; Main Traveled Roads; Crumbling Idols; Wayside Courtships; Prairie Folks; Ulysses Grant: His Life and Character; The Trail of the Gold Seekers; Boy Life on the Prairie; The Spirit of Sweetwater; The Eagle's Heart; Her Mountain Lover; The Captain of the Gray Horse Troop; Hesper; The Tyranny of the Dark; The Long Trail; Money Magic; The Shadow World, etc.

Garnier (gär'-nyâ'), Jean Louis Charles, French architect, was born at Paris, France, 1825. He studied at the school of fine arts, and began to exhibit water colors in 1853, after considerable travel in Italy and Greece. In 1854 he set up as an architect in Paris, and in 1861 competed for the design of the new opera house in Paris. His design was accepted, and he constructed the building, which was completed in 1875. He also built the conservatory at Nice, and the casino at Monte Carlo. He was made an officer of the legion of honor. Died, 1898.

Garrett, R. W., Canadian physician, professor of obstetrics, Queen's university, Kingston, Canada, was born in the county of North Ontario, 1853. He was educated at Ontario college, Picton; M. A., Trinity college, Toronto; M. D., Queen's university, Kingston, Ontario. After receiving his degree in medicine, 1882, he settled in the practice of his profession at Kingston, where he was shortly appointed professor of anatomy in the Women's medical school; was afterward appointed demonstrator of anatomy in the royal college of physicians and surgeons, and later filled the chair of professor of anatomy. Senior surgeon in the Kingston general hospital, and surgeon-major in the 14th battalion princess of Wales' own rifles. Author: Medical and Surgical Gynæcology; editor, Kingston Medical Quarterly.

Garrick, David, English actor, son of a captain in the army, was born in Hereford in 1717. He went to London with Dr. Johnson in 1736 to study law; but an irresistible instinct urged him to the stage. He made his first appearance, under the name of Lyddal, at Ipswich, in 1741, and soon after played Richard III. in the theater of Goodman's Fields, where his success enabled him to get an engagement at Drury Lane. In 1742 he went to Dublin; in 1747 he became joint patentee of Drury Lane, two years later marrying Mademoiselle Violette. He acted at Drury Lane until 1776, when he retired and sold his share in the concern. In 1763 he visited Italy, and in 1769 projected and conducted the memorial jubilee at Stratford-on-Avon in honor of Shakespeare. His last appearance was as Don Felix in The Wonder. He died in 1779 and was buried in Westminster abbey.

Garrison, William Lloyd, American abolitionist, was born at Newburyport, Mass., 1805. As a young man he was chiefly engaged in newspaper work, and soon made himself obnoxious to the then ruling powers by the boldness of his denunciation of slavery. In 1829, while editing The Genius of Universal Emancipation, which was published at Baltimore, his articles on this subject led to his being convicted and imprisoned for libel. He was released from prison on the payment of his fine by a friend, and thereupon commenced his career as an anti-slavery lecturer, which he continued until such agitation was no longer necessary. In 1831 he founded The Liberator, which he published at Boston during thirty-five years. His whole course was attended by the most malignant opposition from the pro-slavery party; his life was frequently threatened, and more than once he was assaulted and publicly handled; but his courage, energy, and ability were inexhaustible, and he lived to see the complete success of the movement which he had done so much to promote. On the abolition of slavery in 1865, he was presented by his friends in the United States with the sum of $30,000. He visited England in 1833, 1846, 1848, 1867, and 1877, and on the last occasion but one he was entertained at a public breakfast in St. James's hall, London, in which the duke of Argyll and Mr. Bright, among others, took part. Died, 1879.

Garth (gärth), Sir Samuel, English physician and poet, was born at Bowland Forest, Yorkshire, 1661, studied at Peterhouse, Cambridge, and Leyden, graduated M. D. in 1691, and next year settled in London. In 1700 he did himself everlasting honor by providing burial in Westminster abbey for the neglected Dryden. He was knighted by George I. and appointed physician in ordinary, and physician-general to the army. He published The Dispensary, 1699, a satire on the apothecaries and physicians who opposed giving medicine gratuitously to the sick poor, and, in 1715, Claremont, a topographical poem. Died, 1719.

Gary, Elbert H., chairman of board of directors and chairman of finance committee of United States steel corporation, was born at Wheaton, Ill., 1846; educated at Wheaton college and Chicago university; graduated from law school, university of Chicago, 1867. Admitted to Illinois bar, 1867, bar of United States supreme court, 1878. First mayor of Wheaton; county judge, Du Page county, two terms; practiced law in Chicago twenty-five years, chiefly as counsel for railroad and manufacturing corporations; president of Chicago bar association, 1893-94; retired from law practice to become president of Federal steel company, 1898; is chairman of board of directors of Allis-Chalmers company, and several banks and other corporations. Trustee of Northwestern university.

Gaskell, Elizabeth Cleghorn Stevenson, English novelist, was born at Cheyne Row, Chelsea, 1810. She married in 1832 William Gaskell, a Unitarian minister in Manchester. Here she studied working men and women. In 1848 she published anonymously Mary Barton, followed by the Moorland Cottage; Cranford; Ruth; North and South; Round the Sofa; Right at Last; Sylvia's Lovers; Cousin Phillis, and Wives and Daughters. She died suddenly at Holybourne, Alton, in Hampshire, 1865, and was fittingly buried at Knutsford. Besides her novels she wrote The Life of Charlotte Brontë, a masterpiece of English biography.

Gassendi (gȧ'-säɴ'-dē'), or Gassend, Pierre, French philosopher and mathematician, was born at Champtercier in Provence, 1592. He studied and taught at Aix, but revolted from the scholastic philosophy, and applied himself to physics and astronomy. His examination of the Aristotelian system appeared in Exercitationes Paradoxicæ adversus Aristoteleos, 1624. In that year he was appointed provost of Digne cathedral; and in 1645 professor of mathematics in the Collège Royal at Paris, where he died, 1655. He controverted Fludd, the mystic, and Descartes's new philosophy; wrote on Epicurus; gave in his Institutio Astronomica a clear view of the science in his day; and published lives of Tycho Brahe, Copernicus, and Regiomontanus.

Gaston de Foix (gäs'-tôɴ' dē fwä), famous French general, was born in 1489. When twenty-three years old he was made commander of the French army in Italy. He defeated the army of Venice, near Brescia, and took the city by storm on the same day. A few weeks afterward he won a victory at Ravenna over the enemy's forces, in one of the hottest battles ever fought, 20,000 men being killed on each side. The victory was so splendid that the hot-blooded young hero grew impatient when he saw some of the enemy's infantry leave the field slowly and in good order, and madly rushed after them in person, followed by Bayard and about twenty knights. He broke the enemy's line, but his horse was wounded and fell; and when Gaston's friends reached him he was dead. He was killed in 1512.

Gates, Horatio, famous American general, was born in England, 1728. Sent to America in 1755, as captain of infantry, he served under General Braddock, and with difficulty escaped in the defeat in which that officer was slain. On the peace of 1763 he purchased an estate in Virginia, where he resided until the war of independence, when he sided with his adopted country, and in 1775 was made adjutant-general in the colonial army. He accompanied Washington to Massachusetts in July of the same year, where he remained until June, 1776, when he received the chief command of the army, which had just retreated from Canada. In March, 1777, he superseded Schuyler in the command of the army of the North, but was himself superseded by Schuyler in the following May. In August he once more undertook the command, and soon compelled the entire British army to surrender at Saratoga. This brilliant success gained for him a great military reputation, and his considerate conduct toward his compatriots won for him the esteem of even his enemies. In 1780 he was called by congress to the command of the army of the South, and in the unfortunate defeat of Camden lost the laurels he had already won. He was superseded, and was not acquitted of blame until 1782, after a protracted trial by court martial. He then retired to Virginia until 1790, when he emancipated all his slaves, and settled in New York. Died, 1806.

Gates, John Warne, capitalist, was born on a farm near Turner Junction (now West Chicago), Ill., 1855. He was educated in country schools, and conducted a small hardware store at Turner Junction, Ill.; became salesman in Texas, introducing barbed wire for I. L. Ellwood; built up a large business; established for himself in St. Louis; organized Southern wire company, 1880; later in Braddock wire company; sold it to Federal steel company, 1898; organized American steel and wire company (now part of United States steel corporation), 1897; was identified with numerous large deals in railway and industrial stock; was director Baltimore and Ohio railroad company, Western Maryland railroad company, Republic iron and steel company of New Jersey, American salt company, United States realty and improvement company, Tennessee coal, iron and railroad company, Clyde steamship company, National bank of North America, etc. Was colonel of Illinois militia, 1897–1901. Died, 1911.

Gates, Merrill Edwards, educator, author, was born at Warsaw, N. Y., 1848; graduated from university of Rochester, 1870; Ph. D., university of State of New York, 1880; LL. D., Princeton and Rochester, 1882, Columbia, 1891, Williams, 1893; L. H. D., Columbia, 1887. He was principal of the Albany boys' academy, 1870–82; president of Rutgers college, 1882–90; president of Amherst college, 1890–99; chairman of United States board of Indian commissioners, 1890–99; president of the American missionary association, 1892–98; and eight years president of the Lake Mohawk Indian conference. He is a member of the American philosophical society, American history association, American social science association; lecturer and writer upon religious, social, and educational themes. Author: Sidney Lanier, Poet and Artist; Land and Law as Agents in Educating the Indians; International Arbitration; Highest Use of Wealth, etc.

Gatling, Richard Jordan, American inventor, was born in North Carolina, 1818. He took his degree in medicine about 1849, but did not practice. In 1850 he invented a hemp-breaking machine, and in 1857 a steam plough; but his most celebrated invention was that of the revolving gun, which bears his name, the conception of which came to him in 1861. In 1865 the gun was improved and tested, and was forthwith brought into use by the United States service. Several European governments also adopted it. Among Dr. Gatling's later inventions were an improved method of casting steel cannon and a pneumatic gun for discharging explosives. Died, 1903.

Gauss (gous), Karl Friedrich, noted German mathematician, was born in Brunswick, Germany, 1777. He was graduated at the Collegium Carolinum in his native city in 1795, at the university of Göttingen in 1798, and then repaired to Helmstadt to avail himself of the library of that place. Here he completed his celebrated Disquisitiones Arithmeticæ, which appeared in 1801, and at once stamped its author as one of the most profound and original mathematicians of any age. In 1809 appeared his Theoria Motus Corporum Cœlestium, in which was also contained the exposition of his newly discovered method of least squares for the treatment of the results of observations. In 1807 he was called to the chair of mathematics and the directorship of the observatory in the university of Göttingen, positions which he held until his death. His investigations here took a wide range, and much of his time was taken up in work in the field of terrestrial magnetism. His complete works, collected and published by the royal society of sciences of Göttingen, fill seven large quarto volumes, with titles as follows: Disquisitiones Arithmeticæ; Higher Arithmetic; Analysis; Geometry and Method of Least Squares; Mathematical Physics; Astronomy; Theoria Motus. Died, 1855.

Gautama (gō'-tȧ-mȧ), Buddha. See page 201.

Gautier (gō'-tyā'), Théophile, French poet and novelist, was born at Tarbes, 1811. From painting he turned to literature, and became a "romanticist" of extreme type. In 1830 he published his first long poem, Albertus; in 1832 the striking Comédie de la Mort, But his poetry reached its highest point in Émaux et Camées, 1856. In 1835 appeared his celebrated novel, Mademoiselle de Maupin, with its defiant preface. He wrote many other novels and shorter stories — Les Jeune France; Fortunio; Une Larme de Diable; Militona; Le Peau de Tigre; Jettatura; Le Capitaine Fracasse; La Belle Jenny; Spirite; etc. Mérimée alone contests with him the palm as the prince of writers of short stories. The first half of Gautier's theatrical criticisms were collected as L'Histoire de l'Art Dramatique en France, 1859. His articles on the salon form perhaps the best history of the French art of his day. His leisure he devoted to travel, of which he published characteristic accounts in his delightful Caprices et Zigzags, Constantinople, Voyage en Russie, and Voyage en Espagne. Other works were an enlarged edition of his Émaux et Camées; Les Grotesques, on the writers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; Honoré de Balzac; Ménagerie Intime, a kind of informal autobiography; Histoire du Romantisme; and the posthumous works, Portraits et Souvenirs Littéraires; and L'Orient. He died at Paris, 1872.

Gay, John, English poet, was born in 1685. He wrote a large number of poems and ballads, besides several operas; but little of his poetry is now read. His greatest success was The Beggar's Opera, which ran sixty-two nights, made the actors celebrated, and in the popular phrase, "made Rich (the manager) gay, and Gay (the author) rich." His Fables and his ballad of Black-eyed Susan also deserve mention. Died, 1732.

Gay, Sydney Howard, American journalist and author, was born at Hingham, Mass., 1814. Early in life he took an ardent interest in the anti-slavery cause and lectured extensively, being editor also of the New York Anti-Slavery Standard. He then became connected with the New York Tribune and was its managing editor from 1862 to 1866. For four years he was editor of the Chicago Tribune, but returning to New York in 1872 he joined the staff of the New York Evening Post. In 1876–80, in conjunction with William Cullen Bryant, he wrote a History of the United States, and in 1884 published a Life of James Madison. Died, 1888.

Gay, Walter, American artist, was born at Hingham, Mass., 1856. He was educated in Boston public schools and Roxbury Latin school. He began to paint flower subjects, 1873; went to Paris, 1876, to study art, where he was a pupil of Bonnat, and was a constant exhibitor at Paris salon. He painted the large picture "Benedicite," now in museum, Amiens, France; "Las Cigarreras," in the Luxembourg, Paris; also pictures in the Tate collection, London, Metropolitan museum of fine arts, New York, and museum of fine arts, Boston. He received gold medals at Antwerp, Vienna, Berlin, Munich, Paris, and Hors Concours, Paris. Life fellow of the Metropolitan museum of fine arts, New York; created chevalier legion of honor, 1894, and officer, 1906. Member of numerous art societies, American and foreign.

Gayarré (gä'-ȧ'-rā'), Charles Étienne Arthur, American historian, was born in New Orleans, 1805. He was admitted to the Philadelphia bar in 1829; was a member of the Louisiana legislature, and judge of the city court of New Orleans. In 1835 he was elected to the United States senate, but on account of ill health resigned his seat. In 1844 he again entered the state legislature, and from 1846 to 1853 was secretary of state of Louisiana. During the civil war he supported the confederacy, and after its close became reporter of the state supreme court. He wrote the valuable History of Louisiana, and several historical sketches. Died, 1895.

Gayley, Charles Mills, author, educator, critic, professor of English, university of California, since 1889, was born at Shanghai, China, 1858. He was a student at Blackheath, England, 1867–74, royal academic institution, Belfast, 1874–75; B. A., university of Michigan, 1878; student Giessen and Halle, 1886–87; Litt. D., Kenyon, 1900; LL. D., Glasgow, 1901, university of Michigan, 1904. He was instructor in Latin, 1880–84, assistant professor of Latin, 1884–86, assistant professor of English, 1887–89, university of Michigan. Author: (with F. N. Scott and A. A. Stanley) Songs of the Yellow and Blue; A Guide to the Literature of Æsthetics (with F. N. Scott); Classic Myths in English Literature; English in Secondary Schools; Methods and Materials of Literary Criticism (with F. N. Scott); Representative English Comedies (5 vols.); The Poetry of the People (with M. C. Flaherty); The Star of Bethlehem; The Principles and Progress of English Poetry (with C. C. Young); Songs of California (edited); Plays of Our Forefathers, etc.

Gay-Lussac (gā'-lü'-säk'), Joseph Louis, French chemist and physicist, was born at St. Léonard in Haute Vienne, 1778. He was educated at the Paris polytechnic school, passed in 1801 to the department of ponts et chaussées, and began a series of researches on vapor, temperature, and terrestrial magnetism. In 1808 he made the important discovery of the law of volumes; in 1809 he became professor of chemistry at the polytechnic, and from 1832 in the Jardin des Plantes. He was the first to form synthetically the hydriodic and iodic acids; and in 1815 he succeeded in isolating cyanogen. His investigations on sulphuric acid, the manufacture of the bleaching chlorides, the centesimal alcoholometer, and the assaying of silver are also important. In 1818 he became superintendent of the government gunpowder factories, and in 1829 chief assayer of the mint. In 1839 he was made a peer of France. For many years, in conjunction with Arago, he was editor of the Annales de Chimie et de Physique, one of the most important scientific publications of France. Died, 1850.

Gaynor, William Jay, jurist, mayor of New York, was born in Whitestown, Oneida county, N. Y., 1851; educated there and in Boston; worked on New York and Brooklyn newspapers, 1873–75, while studying law; admitted to bar and began practice, 1875. Became a national figure by his breaking up of rings within the democratic party and securing convictions for election frauds; he twice declined democratic nomination for governor; elected by republicans and independent democrats judge of New York supreme court, 1893; reëlected, 1907, and designated justice of appellate division of supreme court; received democratic nomination for mayor of New York city, 1909, and was the only candidate on the ticket elected. An attempt to assassinate him failed in 1910.

Gaza (gä'-zä), Theodorus, Italian scholar, one of the earliest to revive Greek learning in the West, was born at Thessalonica, 1398. He fled about 1430 before the Turks to Italy, and became teacher of Greek at Ferrara, next of philosophy at Rome. Cardinal Bessarion obtained for him a small benefice in Calabria. His principal work was a Greek grammar issued in 1495. He translated into Latin portions of Aristotle, Theophrastus, St. Chrysostom, Hippocrates, and other Greek writers. Died, 1478.

Geddes (gĕd'-ĭs), Patrick, British biologist and botanist, was born at Perth, 1854. He was educated at the normal school of science, London, and at several foreign universities; became professor of botany at Dundee. His aim is to moralize evolution and carry principles from biology into history and sociology. Besides important articles in the encyclopædias and journals, he has written Chapters in Modern Botany and (with J. A. Thomson) The Evolution of Sex. He is identified with vast schemes of housebuilding in Edinburgh, and of social, academic, and economic reform.

Geefs (gāfs), Guillaume, Belgian sculptor, was born at Antwerp, 1806. After studying there for some time he went to Paris, where he worked in the studio of M. Ramey. During the revolution of 1830 he quitted Paris and returned to Belgium, and soon after executed at Brussels a monument to the memory of the victims of the revolution of 1830. The most important of his other works are a colossal marble statue of King Leopold, monument to Count Frédéric de Mérode, now in the cathedral of Brussels, and statue of General Belliard. He executed a group entitled "Le Lion Amoureux," which was shown at the exhibition in Paris, 1855. He died in 1883.

Gegenbaur (gā'-gen-bour), Karl, German comparative anatomist, was born at Würzburg, 1826. He received a chair at Jena in 1855, and at Heidelberg in 1873. His chief works are Comparative Anatomy and Human Anatomy. He edited the Year-book of Morphology in 1875, and is the author of Elements of Comparative Anatomy; Text-book of Human Anatomy; Epiglottis; Comparative Anatomy of the Vertebrates in Relation to the Invertebrates, etc. Died, 1903.

Geibel (gī'-bĕl), Emanuel von, German poet, was born at Lübeck, 1815. He studied at Bonn and Berlin, and afterward went to Athens as tutor in the household of the Russian ambassador. He returned to Lübeck in 1840 and published his first book of poems. His Voices of the Time appeared in 1841, a book of Sonnets in 1846, and Songs of Junius, 1848. He obtained a professorship at Munich, 1852, which he resigned, 1868. Among his later volumes are: Poems and Leaves of Thought; Herald Calls; Late Autumn Leaves; and an epic, King Sigurd's Courting Journey. He also wrote several dramas. Died, 1884.

Geikie (gē'-kĭ), Sir Archibald, British geologist, was born at Edinburgh, 1835. He was educated at the Edinburgh high school and university. In 1855 he was appointed to the geological survey, and in 1867 he became director of the survey in Scotland; from 1871 to 1882 he was professor of geology and mineralogy at Edinburgh; and was director-general of the survey of the United Kingdom, and head of the geological museum, London, 1882–1901. Among his works are the Story of a Boulder; Phenomena of the Glacial Drift of Scotland; The Scenery of Scotland Viewed in Connection with its Physical Geology; Memoir of Sir R. Murchison; Memoir of Sir A. C. Ramsay; Ancient Volcanoes of Britain, etc. He was knighted in 1891.

Geikie, James, British geologist, brother of preceding, professor of geology and mineralogy since 1882 and dean of the faculty of science, Edinburgh university, was born at Edinburgh, 1839. He was graduated at Edinburgh university; LL. D., D. C. L., London and Edinburgh. Entered H. M. geological survey, 1861; became district surveyor, 1869; Murchison chair of geology in Edinburgh university, 1882; one of the founders and past president of the royal Scottish geographical society, and honorary editor of Scottish Geographical Magazine. Author: The Great Ice Age; Prehistoric Europe; Outlines of Geology; Fragments of Earth Lore; Songs and Lyrics by Heinrich Heine; Earth Sculpture; Structural and Field Geology, etc.

Gelée (zhe'-lā'), Claude. See Claude of Lorrain.

Gellert (gĕl'-ĕrt), Christian Fürchtegott, German poet and moralist, was born at Hainichen, Saxony, 1715. He was educated at Leipzig, and in 1751 became a professor there. He revolted against current pedantry, and thus pioneered the way for Goethe and Schiller. His writings, fables, tales, hymns, etc., were collected in ten volumes. He died in 1769.

Gellius (jĕl'-ĭ-ŭs), Aulus, Latin author, supposed to have been born at Rome about 117 A. D. He practiced law there, after studying philosophy at Athens, and wrote the Noctes Atticæ, or "Attic Nights," a medley on language, antiquities, history, and literature, in twenty books, of which the eighth is wanting. It contains many extracts from lost Greek and Latin authors. The best edition is by Hertz. He died about 180 A. D.

Gelon (jē'-lŏn), tyrant of Gela and Syracuse, was the son of Deinomenes, and a native of the former city. He first figures in history as one of the body-guards in the service of Hippocrates, tyrant of Gela. On the death of the latter he obtained the supreme power, 491 B. C., and about 485 B. C. made himself master of Syracuse. His influence soon extended itself over the half of Sicily. Gelon refused to aid the Greeks against Xerxes, as they declined to comply with his demand that he should be appointed commander-in-chief. About the same time Terillus, ruler of Himera, in Sicily, invoked the aid of the Carthaginians against Theron of Agrigentum, who had dispossessed him of his state. Gelon, who was in alliance with Theron, hastened to the assistance of the latter, and on the same day on which the Greeks won the battle of Salamis he gained a complete victory over the invaders at Himera. The consequence was an immediate treaty of peace between him and the Carthaginians, who were compelled to pay all the expenses of the war. His clemency and the wisdom of his measures rendered him so generally beloved that when he appeared unarmed in an assembly of the people, and declared himself ready to resign his power, he was unanimously hailed as the deliverer and sovereign of Syracuse. Died, 478 B. C.

Genêt, or Genest (zhĕ-nĕ'), Edmond Charles Édouard, French diplomat, was born in France in 1765. He entered the French diplomatic service as chargé d'affaires at St. Petersburg in 1789, but was sent home in 1791, and in December, 1792, was accredited to the United States. He transgressed the laws of neutrality by issuing commissions to privateers to prey upon English commerce, France being then at war with England. He complained bitterly of the lack of sympathy displayed by the young republic to its old ally, and did his best to embroil the United States with Great Britain. Washington demanded and obtained his recall, but Genêt decided to become a naturalized citizen. He settled in New York, and married a daughter of Governor Clinton. He was the author of some historical works, and translated a Swedish history. Died at Schodack, N. Y., 1834.

Geneviève (zhĕn'-vyĕv'), Saint, patroness of Paris, was born at Nanterre near Paris, about 422. She took the veil, and acquired an extraordinary reputation for sanctity, increased by her assurance that Attila and his Huns would not touch Paris, and by an expedition for the relief of the starving city during Childeric's Frankish invasion. In 460 she built a church over the tomb of St. Denis, where she herself was buried. Died, 512.

Genghis Khan (jĕn'-gĭz ᴋăn'), celebrated Mongol conqueror, was born near Lake Baikal, 1162, the son of a Mongol chief. His career as a soldier began at the age of thirteen, an age at which he boldly assumed the reins of government in succession to his father. By his military skill and daring example he gradually raised his people to a position of supremacy in Asia, and established by means of them a kingdom which, at his death, stretched from the Volga to the Pacific, and from Siberia to the Persian gulf. He regarded himself as commissioned by heaven to conquer the world, a destiny which he almost fulfilled. Died, 1227.

Genseric (jĕn'-sĕr-ĭk), king of the Vandals, son of Godigisdus, founder of the Vandal kingdom in Spain, and natural brother of Gonderic, whom he succeeded in 429, was born in 406 A. D. From Spain he crossed to Africa, and in conjunction with the Moors added to his kingdom the land lying west of Carthage, ultimately gaining possession of Carthage itself. He next set himself to organize a naval force, with which he systematically from year to year pillaged Spain, Italy, Greece, and the opposite lands of Asia Minor, sacking Rome in 455. He continued master of the seas until his death in 477, despite strenuous efforts of the Roman emperors to crush his power.

Gentz, von (fōn gĕnts'), Frederick, German diplomat and publicist, was born at Breslau, 1764. In 1786 he entered the public service of Prussia, but in 1802 exchanged into that of Austria. He wrote bitterly against Napoleon. An adherent of Metternich from 1810, at the congress of Vienna in 1814 he was first secretary, as also in subsequent conferences. His writings are distinguished for elegance, but his pen was on sale to the highest bidder; and he drew the supplies for his lavish private expenditure from more than one foreign government. Died, 1832.

Genung (jĕ-nŭng'), John Franklin, educator, professor of literature and biblical interpretation, Amherst college, was born at Willseyville, N. Y., 1850. He graduated at Union college, 1870, Rochester theological seminary, 1875; Ph. D., Leipzig, 1881; D. D., Yale, 1905. Author: Tennyson's In Memoriam—Its Purpose and Its Structure; Practical Elements of Rhetoric; The Study of Rhetoric in the College Course; Hand-Book of Rhetorical Analysis; The Epic of the Inner Life, Being the Book of Job; Outlines of Rhetoric; What a Carpenter Did with His Bible; The Passing of Self; The Working Principles of Rhetoric; Stevenson's Attitude to Life; Ecclesiastes and Omar Khayyam; Words of Koheleth, Being a Study and Translation of the Book of Ecclesiastes; The Hebrew Literature of Wisdom In the Light of Today; The Idylls and the Ages, etc.

Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire (zhō'-frwä' săɴ'-tē'-lâr'), Étienne, French naturalist, was born at Étampes, 1772, became a pupil of Haüy at the college of Navarre, Paris, and in 1793 professor of zoölogy in the museum of natural history. He accompanied Napoleon's expedition to Egypt, for the collection of specimens, and after his return laid the basis of scientific anatomy by enunciating his well-known theory of the unity of organic composition. He filled the chair of zoölogy at the faculty of sciences, 1809, and evoked a great controversy with Cuvier by the publication of his Philosophie Anatomique, 1818–22. He was also the author of several other valuable works illustrative of the science to which he was devoted. Died, 1844.

George, Grace, actress, was born in New York, 1880. She received a convent education, and married William A. Brady, 1899. Made her début in The New Boy, New York, 1894; appeared in leading parts in The Girl I Left Behind Me; Charley's Aunt; The Wandering Minstrel; The Turtle; Mlle. Fifi; starred in The Princess Chiffon, 1899; Her Majesty, 1900; Under Southern Skies, 1901-02; Frou Frou, 1903; Pretty Peggy, 1903-04; The Two Orphans, 1904;

Abigail, 1904; The Marriage of William Ashe, 1905-06; The Richest Girl, 1906; Clothes, 1906; Divorcons, 1907, etc.

George, Henry, American economist and sociologist, was born in Philadelphia, 1839. After being successively at sea, in a counting-house, and a printer's office, he settled in California, and in 1866 joined the staff of a San Francisco paper. He afterward became editor of two papers there, and wrote his first essay on the land question in Our Land and Land Policy, published in 1871. In 1876 he was state inspector of gasmeters, but in 1880 removed to New York, and the next year visited Ireland on his way to England. He was there arrested as a "suspect" under Forster's act, but was soon released. He wrote Progress and Poverty in 1879, and undertook lecturing tours in 1883 and 1889 in support of his principles. He also published The Irish Land Question, Social Problems, Protection and Free Trade, and The Science of Political Economy. Candidate for mayor, New York, 1886 and 1897. Died, 1897.

George I., king of Great Britain from 1714 to 1727, was born in 1660. He was the son of Ernest Augustus, elector of Hanover, and of Sophia, the granddaughter of James I. of England; and, on the death of Anne, he ascended the throne, being the first monarch of the house of Hanover. The early part of his reign was troubled by the conspiracies and rebellions of the Jacobites, aggravated by foreign wars; and in 1720 the collapse of the famous South sea scheme occurred, when thousands of families were ruined. In 1727 the king set out on a visit to his Hanoverian dominions, but had only reached Osnabrück when he was struck down by apoplexy. By his marriage with Sophia Dorothea, a daughter of the duke of Zell, he left one son, George Augustus, who succeeded him, and one daughter, Sophia Dorothea, who, in 1706, was married to Frederick II. of Prussia, and became the mother of Frederick the Great.

George II., son and successor of George I., and king of Great Britain from 1727 to 1760, was born in 1683. Ascending the throne when forty-four years of age, he had the advantage over his father of being able to speak English, which George I. could never do. But he also had to cope with Jacobite conspiracies, and to contend with Charles Edward Stuart, the young pretender; nor was the latter entirely defeated until the battle of Culloden, which was fought April 27, 1746. The war of the Austrian succession occurred in this reign, the object of which was to secure Maria Theresa of Hungary, the daughter of Charles VI. of Germany, from the partition of her Austrian dominions; and this war was only brought to a close by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, October 7, 1748. In 1756 the seven years' war broke out, in which England sided with Prussia; and the last years of the king's reign saw the British victors in India, Canada, and on the seas. He died, 1760.

George III., king of Great Britain from 1760 to 1820, and king of Hanover (elector from 1760 to 1815), eldest son of Frederick Louis, prince of Wales, was born in London, 1738. In 1761 he married Princess Charlotte Sophia of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, by whom he had fifteen children. More English in sentiment and education than his two predecessors, George's main interest was centered in his English kingdom, and never during his long life did he once set foot in his Hanoverian possessions. At his accession he found the seven years' war in progress, and he was later involved in the war of the American revolution and the Napoleonic wars. In 1801 the legislative union of Great Britain and Ireland was effected. Died at Windsor, 1820.

George V., king of Great Britain and Ireland, and emperor of India, was born at Marlborough House, London, 1865, the second son of Edward VII. The death of his elder brother, Albert, in 1892 made him heir apparent to the British throne, and he took his seat in the house of lords as duke of York. Upon the accession of Edward VII. in 1901, he received the title of duke of Cornwall. At this time he made a tour of all the large British colonies, gaining great popularity. On his return he was created prince of Wales. In July, 1893, he married Princess Victoria May of Teck, and six children have been born to them. On the death of Edward VII., the new king ascended the throne under the title of George V., May 7, 1910. The coronation took place, June 22, 1911. He was crowned emperor of India at the durbar at Delhi, December 12, 1911. The early months of his reign were marked by the agitation against the house of lords, which resulted finally in the abolition of the veto powers of the upper house.

George I., king of Greece, was born at Copenhagen, 1845. He was a brother of the dowager empress of Russia, Queen Alexandra, and King Frederick of Denmark. Chosen king of Greece in 1863, in succession to Otho I. Married Princess Olga, daughter of the Russian Grand Duke Constantine, 1867, and had five sons and one daughter. An attempt to assassinate him was made in 1898, but happily failed. The king was of the Lutheran faith, but by the constitution his heirs and successors must be members of the Greek orthodox church. He was assassinated, 1913. His eldest son, Constantine, succeeded to the throne, March 18, 1913.

George, Saint, the patron saint of England. His true history is not clearly known. A story is told about him that he slew a dragon, which had been sent by a magician to devour an Egyptian princess, and in pictures he is generally shown in the act of killing the monster. Some say the real Saint George was a soldier in the army of Diocletian, 300 A. D., and that he suffered death for the Christian faith. English crusaders brought home his fame from the East, and Edward III. made him patron of his new order of the garter. His name became the English battle-cry, and since then he has been considered the especial saint of Russia, and the Russians have an order of Saint George.

Gérard (zhā'-rär'), Étienne Maurice, Count, marshal of France, was born in Lorraine, 1773. He specially distinguished himself at Austerlitz, Halle, Jena, Erfurt, Lintz, and Wagram. On the morning after this last battle he received the title of baron of the empire. In 1831 Louis Philippe appointed Gérard a marshal of France, and gave him command of the expedition to Belgium, in the course of which he distinguished himself by taking Antwerp in 1832. Died, 1852.

Gérard, François Pascal, Baron, French painter, was born in Rome, 1770. Nearly the whole of his life was spent in Paris, where he was first pupil and assistant to David, but speedily acquired a splendid reputation of his own. Most of the leading men and women of the French empire were painted by Gérard, and he became known as the "painter of kings." Famous portraits were those of Napoleon, Talleyrand, Talma, and Mme. Récamier; famous paintings, the "Battle of Austerlitz" and "Entry of Henry IV. into Paris." He was afterward appointed court-painter to Louis XVIII., from whom he received the rank of baron. Died, 1837.

Gerhardt (gĕr'-härt), Karl Friedrich, German chemist, was born at Strassburg in 1816. At the time of his death he was professor of chemistry in the university of Strassburg. He was one of the most famous of the pupils of Liebig, and, 1848 was sent to the Frankfort parliament, where he was a vigorous opponent of Prussia. He went ovér to the Roman Catholic church in 1853. Among his other works are Geschichte der Karolinger and Papst Gregorius VII. Died at Carlsbad, 1861.

Ghiberti (gē-bĕr′-tē), Lorenzo, Italian sculptor, was born in Florence about 1378. He was engaged in painting in fresco at Rimini, in the palace of Prince Pandolfo Malatesta, when the priori of the society of merchants in Florence invited artists to propose models for one of the bronze doors of the baptistery of San Giovanni. The offering up of Isaac was to be executed in gilt bronze, as a specimen of the work. The judges selected the works of Brunelleschi and Ghiberti as the best, but the former voluntarily withdrew his claims, giving the preference to Ghiberti. After twenty-one years' labor Ghiberti completed the door, and at the request of the priori executed a second after almost as long a period. Michaelangelo said of these that they were worthy of adorning the entrance to paradise. During these forty years Ghiberti also completed a statue of John the Baptist for the church Or-San-Michele, two bas-reliefs for the baptistery of the cathedral of Siena, and a number of other works, all of which are still preserved. He died in Florence in 1455.

Ghika (gē′-kä), Helena, or "Dora d'Istria," daughter of Prince Michael Ghika, was born at Bucharest, 1828. Profoundly instructed in the classics, she gained by travel an extensive knowledge of modern languages and literature. At fifteen she translated the Iliad into German, and not long after wrote several pieces for the theater. On her marriage in 1849 with Prince Koltzoff-Massalsky she accompanied him to St. Petersburg; but from 1855 she lived mainly at Florence. Her works include: La Vie Monastique dans l'Église Orientale; La Suisse Allemande; Les Femmes en Orient; Excursions en Roumélie; Les Lacs Helvétiques; Gli Albanesi in Rumenia, and La Poésie des Ottomans. She wrote much for the Revue des Deux Mondes. Died, 1888.

Ghirlandajo (gēr′-län-dä′-yō), otherwise called Corradi, or Bigordi, Domenico del, Florentine painter, was born in 1449. He assisted in the decoration of the Sistine chapel in Rome, and executed a series of frescoes in the Sassetti chapel in Santissima Trinità, Florence. He also painted many easel pictures in oil and distemper; but his frescoes are incomparably his finest works. He is said to have created aërial perspective, and to have perfected the art of mosaic. He was the master of Michaelangelo. Died, 1494.

Gibbon, Edward. See page 74.

Gibbons, Grinling, English sculptor and woodcarver, was born at Rotterdam, 1648. He had for some time practiced his art in England, when, discovered by Evelyn carving a crucifix, 1671, he was appointed by Charles II. to a place in the board of works, and employed in the chapel at Windsor. Here and in St. Paul's, London, his work displays great taste and delicacy of finish. At Chatsworth, Burleigh, Southwick, and other mansions he executed an immense quantity of carved embellishment. The ceiling of a room at Petworth is his masterpiece. Died in London, 1721.

Gibbons, James, Roman Catholic cardinal, was born in Baltimore, Md., 1834. At an early age he was taken by his parents to their former home in Ireland, where he began his education. He returned to the United States, and resided with his family in New Orleans, 1848; entered St. Charles college, Maryland, 1855; transferred, 1857, to St Mary's seminary, Baltimore; ordained priest, 1861; assistant at St. Patrick's, Baltimore, for a few months; was then pastor of St. Bridget's, Canton (suburb of Baltimore); later private secretary to Archbishop Spalding and chancellor of the arch-diocese; assistant chancellor, second plenary council of American Roman Catholic church, Baltimore, 1866; vicar apostolic of North Carolina, with rank and title of bishop, 1868; coadjutor archbishop of Baltimore, 1877; succeeded to the see, 1877; presided at third national council at Baltimore, 1884; was nominated as cardinal; invested with the princely insignia, 1886. Author: The Faith of Our Fathers; Our Christian Heritage; The Ambassador of Christ, etc.

Gibbs, Oliver Wolcott, American chemist, was born in New York city, 1822; was graduated at Columbia, 1841, studied chemistry in Paris and Berlin. In 1849 he was chosen professor of physics and chemistry in the college of the city of New York, and in 1863 took charge of the Lawrence scientific school laboratory at Harvard. He became professor emeritus, 1887, was a member of many home and foreign scientific societies and an LL. D. of Columbia. Died, 1908.

Settled as Unitarian clergyman over three parishes in Massachusetts, 1872–84; professor in Antioch college, Ohio, 1878–81; editor of Literary World, Boston, 1888–95, The New World, 1892–1900. Author: Profit Sharing Between Employer and Employee; Laws of Daily Conduct; Socialism and the American Spirit; A Dividend to Labor, and Methods of Industrial Peace. Died, 1912.

Ginn, Edwin, publisher, was born at Orland, Me., 1838. Graduated at Tufts college, 1862. Engaged in publishing business; head of the firm of Ginn and Company, publishers of school and college text-books. His first book was Allen's Latin Grammar, published in 1868. His house is now second to no other single firm in America. He has been especially interested in the housing of the poor and in promoting better conditions between labor and capital, as well as in the movement for universal peace among the nations.

Gioberti (jō-bâr'-tē), Vincenzo, Italian statesman, was born at Turin, 1801. In 1831 he became chaplain to Charles Albert of Sardinia, but his liberal views being obnoxious to the clerical party, he was banished in 1833. He settled at Brussels as a private tutor, and published an Introduzione allo Studio della Filosofia, Del Bello, and Del Buono. His conception of the papacy as the divinely appointed agency for the elevation of Italy among the nations he expounded in Del Primato Civile e Morale degli Italiani. It was hailed with enthusiasm, and his fame was enhanced by Il Gesuita Moderno against the Jesuits. Returning to Italy in 1848, he was for ten weeks prime minister, then settled in Paris, where he died in 1852.

Giorgione (jŏr-jō'-nā), or Giorgio Barbarelli, Italian painter, was born at Castelfranco about 1478. He studied at Venice under Giovanni Bellini, and soon developed a freer and larger manner, characterized by intense poetic feeling and by great beauty and richness of coloring. Several early portraits by him have disappeared, but his "Enthroned Madonna" is an altar-piece at Castelfranco. In Venice he was extensively employed in fresco-painting, but some fragments in the Fondaco de' Tedeschi are all that now remain of this work. "The Family of Giorgione" at Venice, "The Three Philosophers" at Vienna, and the "Sleeping Venus" in the Dresden gallery are representative canvases. Giorgione ranks with the very greatest of Venetian painters, and powerfully influenced his contemporaries, even Titian. Died, 1511.

Giotto (jŏt'-tō), or Ambrogio (or Ambrogiotto, shortened to Giotto), di Bondone, Italian painter and architect, was born in 1276. He was a pupil of Cimabue and friend of Dante, whose portrait he painted at Ravenna. He painted frescoes at Assisi, and was probably the founder of the modern school of portrait-painting. About 1299 he went to Rome, where he painted and worked in mosaics; and subsequently was employed at Padua and Florence, where his frescoes in the Peruzzi chapel of Santa Croce were discovered in 1863. He also painted the "Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes," at Naples, and designed the campanile of Florence. He died in 1336, and was buried in the cathedral there.

Girard (jĭ-rărd'), Stephen, American philanthropist, was born near Bordeaux, France, 1750. He became a sailor, and before the revolution engaged as the master of vessels in the American coasting and West Indian trade. During the revolution he was a grocer, sutler, and liquor-seller in and near Philadelphia. He was again in the West Indian and coastwise trade in partnership with John, his brother, in 1780–90, eventually became a banker, and amassed a large fortune. He was very eccentric in his habits, a freethinker, ungracious in manner and ill-tempered, but a liberal benefactor of public charities. During several yellow fever seasons in Philadelphia no citizen was more active in relieving distress; and at his death nearly all his estate was bequeathed to various charitable and municipal institutions of Philadelphia and New Orleans, and to the founding of Girard college for orphan boys. Died, 1831.

Giulio Romano (jōōl'-yō rō-mä'-nō) (Giulio Pippi de' Giannuzzi), Italian painter and architect, was born at Rome about 1492. He assisted Raphael in the execution of several of his finest works, and at his death completed the "Apparition of the Cross" in the vatican. In 1524 he went to Mantua on the invitation of the duke. The drainage of the marshes and the protection of the city from the inundations of the Po and Mincio attest his skill as an engineer; while his genius as an architect found scope in the restoration and adornment of the Palazzo del Tè, the cathedral, and a ducal palace. In Bologna he designed the façade of the church of San Petronio. Among his oil pictures are the "Martyrdom of St. Stephen," "A Holy Family," "Mary and Jesus," and the "Madonna della Gatta." He died at Mantua, 1546.

Gladden, Washington, author, Congregational clergyman, was born in Pottsgrove, Pa., 1836. He was graduated at Williams college, 1859; D. D., Roanoke college, Va., LL. D., university of Wisconsin and Notre Dame university, Ind. He held several pastorates and editorial positions prior to becoming, in 1882, pastor of First Congregational church, Columbus, Ohio. Author: Plain Thoughts on the Art of Living; From the Hub to the Hudson; Workingmen and Their Employers; Being a Christian; The Christian Way; The Lord's Prayer; The Christian League of Connecticut; Things New and Old; The Young Men and the Churches; Applied Christianity; Parish Problems; Burning Questions; Santa Claus on a Lark; Who Wrote the Bible; Tools and the Man; The Cosmopolis City Club; The Church and the Kingdom; Seven Puzzling Bible Books; Social Facts and Forces; Art and Morality; The Christian Pastor; How Much is Left of the Old Doctrines; Straight Shots at Young Men; Social Salvation; The Practice of Immortality; Where Does the Sky Begin? Christianity and Socialism; The New Idolatry, etc.

Gladstone (glăd'-stŭn), William Ewart, English statesman, orator, and man of letters, was born in Liverpool, 1809. He was graduated at Oxford, and entered the house of commons in 1832 for the borough of Newark. He held the post of first junior lord of the treasury, and afterward that of under-secretary of state for the colonies in the Peel government for a few months in 1835. In 1838 he published his first work, The State in Its Relations with the Church. In 1847 he was elected a member of parliament for the university of Oxford, which he represented for eighteen years, and established his name among British statesmen. He advocated the cause of Italian independence in many eloquent speeches. In 1858 he accepted a special mission to the Ionian islands. In the same year he published an elaborate work on Homer and the Homeric Age, in three volumes. In 1860 he carried through parliament a commercial treaty with France. In 1866, now leader of the house of commons, he brought in a reform bill, the defeat of which caused Earl Russell to resign. Gladstone, in 1869, disestablished the Irish church; in 1870 carried his Irish land bill; in 1871 abolished, by the exercise of the royal prerogative, the purchase of rank in the army; and in 1872 carried the ballot bill. In 1874 he dissolved parliament, and on the unfavorable result of the ensuing election the Gladstone ministry resigned. In 1876 he strongly denounced, by voice and pen, the Turkish cruelties in Bulgaria, and advocated the autonomy of the Christian provinces subject to the porte. On the defeat of the Disraeli administration at the polls, 1880, he became premier, but resigned in 1885. Early in 1886, after the short-lived administration of Lord Salisbury, Gladstone again came into power, and signalized his return to office by presenting in 1886 a dual scheme of Irish government — a land bill and a home rule bill. Intense and bitter opposition from liberals and conservatives alike greeted the measure, and the bill was rejected on its second reading in 1886. In consequence parliament was dissolved, and Gladstone and his colleagues appealed to the country, but were defeated. During the succeeding years, 1887–91, Gladstone was in opposition, the chief incident in his career being his outspoken advocacy of home rule in Ireland and his consequent alliance with the Irish party. At the general election of 1892 his supporters obtained a slight majority in parliament, and he became prime minister for the fourth time. He resigned in 1894 on account of increasing years, and spent his last days chiefly in literary work, the fruit of which, added to earlier works, gives evidence of the breadth of his sympathies, and the extent of his scholarly attainments. Seized by a fatal malady, his strong constitution gradually sank under it, and he died at Hawarden, 1898, and was buried in Westminster abbey.

Glanville, Ranulf de, chief-justiciary of England in 1180–89, and reputed author of the earliest treatise on the laws of England, the Tractatus de Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ, was born at Stratford St. Andrew, near Saxmundham, about 1130. He was sheriff of Lancashire in 1173; in 1174 he raised a body of knights to fight against William the Lion of Scotland, and was one of the most important persons during the reign of Henry II. He died at the siege of Acre, 1190.

Glasgow, Ellen Anderson Gholson, American novelist, was born at Richmond, Va., 1874. She is the daughter of Francis Thomas Glasgow. She received a private education. Author: The Descendant; Phases of an Inferior Planet; The Voice of the People; The Freeman and Other Poems; The Battle-ground; The Deliverance; The Wheel of Life, etc.

Glauber (glou'-bĕr), Johann Rudolph, German chemist and physician, was born at Karlstadt in Franconia, 1604. In 1648 he discovered hydrochloric acid; he was probably the first to procure nitric acid; and his name lives in Glauber's salt, a neutral sulphate of soda discovered by him. He was a voluminous writer on chemical subjects and his treatises were translated by Christopher Packe. Died, 1668.

Glazebrook (glāz'-brŏŏk), Richard Tetley, British educator and physicist, principal of University college, Liverpool, 1898-99, was born in 1854. He was educated at Liverpool college, and at Trinity college, Cambridge; Sc. D., Victoria and Heidelberg. Author: Text-books of Physical Optics, and of Practical Physics (with W. N. Shaw); Laws and Properties of Matter; Clerk-Maxwell and Modern Physics; Text-books of Heat, Light, Mechanics, and Electricity; Cambridge Natural Science Manuals. He has been fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge, since 1877; director of the national physical laboratory since 1899; and president of the institute of electrical engineers, 1906.

Glendower (glĕn'-dŏŏr), or Glendwr, Owen, Welsh chief, claimed descent from Llewelyn, the last prince of Wales, and was born in Montgomeryshire about 1359. He studied law at Westminster, and became esquire to the earl of Arundel, but in 1401 fell into dispute with Lord Grey over some lands, and, unable to obtain redress from Henry IV., carried on a guerilla warfare against the English marchers. In 1402 he captured Lord Grey and Sir Edmund Mortimer, both of whom married daughters of the Welsh chieftain (now proclaimed prince of Wales), and joined him in the coalition with Harry Percy (Hotspur). That coalition ended in the battle of Shrewsbury, 1403, won by King Henry. In 1404 Glendower entered into a treaty with Charles VI. of France, who in 1405 sent a force to Wales; and the Welsh prince, though often defeated, kept up a desultory warfare until his death, about 1416.

Glenn, Robert Brodnax, lawyer, ex-governor of North Carolina, was born in Rockingham county, N. C., 1854. He was educated by tutor at home, at high school, Leaksville, N. C., Davidson college, N. C., university of Virginia, and Pearson's law school, Richmond Hill, N. C. Engaged in general law practice at Danbury, N. C., 1878; in 1886 with W. B. Glenn; in 1891 with Manly and Hendren. He was assistant division counsel for the Southern railway, attorney for the Western Union telegraph company, etc. Was member of legislature, 1881; district attorney for the United States, 1893–97; governor of North Carolina, 1905–09.

Glinka (glĭng'-kä), Mikhail Ivanovitch, composer, "the Russian Beethoven," was born near Novospaskoi, 1804. He studied under John Field in St. Petersburg. Several songs, and the operas Life for the Czar and Russlan and Ludmilla, all in Russian, have received high praise from critics. He died at Berlin in 1857.

Gluck (glŏŏk), Christoph Willibald, German composer, was born at Weidenwang, in Bavaria, 1714. He studied music at Prague, Vienna, and Milan, and began his career at Vienna at the age of twenty-two. His best known works are Alceste, Paride ed Elena, and Orfeo, composed in Vienna; and Iphigénie en Tauride, composed in Paris. For several years he was a resident in London, where some of his earlier operas were written. His last years were passed in Vienna, where he died of paralysis, 1787.

Gneist (g'nīst'). Rudolph von, German jurist, was born in Berlin, 1816. He studied law at Berlin, and was successively assistant-judge of the superior court and senior judge of the supreme court of Prussia. In 1850 he resigned, and in 1858 became a member of the Prussian lower house and also of the imperial diet. From 1844 until his death he also held the chair of jurisprudence in the university of Berlin. He became a member of the privy council in 1875; was ennobled in 1888, and died in 1895. Among his works are Adel und Ritterschaft in England; Das heutige englische Verfassungs- und Verwaltungsrecht, a work contrasting English and German law and administration; History of the English Constitution; The English Parliament, and Die nationale Rechtsidee.

Godfrey de Bouillon. See Bouillon.

Godolphin (gō-dŏl'-fĭn), Sidney, first Earl of, English statesman, was born about 1645. At the restoration he became one of the grooms of the bedchamber to Charles II., was appointed one of the secretaries of state in 1684, and soon after first commissioner of the treasury; was twice dispatched to Holland in 1678 on business of importance, and argued and voted for the exclusion of the duke of York from the succession in 1680. In 1702, on the accession of Anne, he accepted the office of lord high treasurer, raised the public credit, induced the queen to contribute 100,000 pounds toward the war, firmly opposed the selling of offices and places, and increased the stipends of the inferior clergy. The contest between Godolphin and Harley for the premiership resulted in the defeat of Godolphin, who was dismissed from office in 1710. Died, 1712.

Elected United States senator for term, 1913-19.

Gogol (gō'-gŏl-y'), Nikolai Vassilyevitch, Russian novelist, was born at Sorochintsi in Poltava, 1809. In 1828 he settled in St. Petersburg, and became famous through two series of stories of Little Russia. One of the best of Russian comedies is The Inspector-General, exposing the corruption, ignorance, and vanity of the provincial officials. His masterpiece, Dead Souls, or better Dead Serfs, is a story reflecting the more sordid aspects of provincial life. After unsatisfactory trials of official life, and of public teaching, including university history lectures at St. Petersburg in 1834, Gogol left Russia in 1836 to live abroad, mostly in Rome, until 1846, when he returned to Russia. He was the first great master of the Russian novel. Died at Moscow, 1852.

Goldmark, Karl, Austrian composer, was born at Keszthely, Hungary, of Jewish parents, about 1832, but has chiefly resided in Vienna. He is well known by his operas, The Queen of Sheba and Merlin, which were performed for the first time on any stage at the Metropolitan opera house, New York, in 1887, and by the very effective overtures, Sakuntala and Penthesilea. The Ländliche Hochzeit (Country Wedding) symphony is a great favorite. In 1900 he completed the opera Cricket on the Hearth, and subsequently Götz von Berlichingen.

Goldoni (gŏl-dō'-nē), Carlo, Italian dramatist, was born at Venice, 1707. He studied for the law, but his heart was set upon play-writing. A tragedy, Belisario, proved successful, but he soon discovered that his forte was comedy, and set himself to effect a revolution in the Italian comic stage. He spent several years in wandering over north Italy, until in 1740 he settled in his birthplace, where for twenty years he poured forth comedy after comedy. In 1761 he undertook to write for the Italian theater in Paris, and was attached to the French court until the revolution. He died in 1793.

Goldsmith, Oliver, British poet and novelist, was born in Ireland, 1728. He was graduated at the university of Dublin, 1749, and then went to Italy, where he took his degree of M. D. at Padua or Louvain, and returned to England in 1756. With the assistance of Dr. Sleigh, a fellow-student, he began practice as physician among the poor. He did not succeed in his profession and is represented as having become usher in the academy of Dr. Miller at Peckham. During this period he supported himself by contributions to the Monthly Review. He became a candidate for a medical appointment at Coromandel, but was rejected by the college of surgeons. The clothes in which he appeared for examination had been procured on the security of Griffiths, editor of the Monthly Review; and as Goldsmith, urged by sharp distress, had pawned them, his publisher threatened him with the terrors of a jail. He had now reached the lowest depth of misery; but the dawn was about to break. His first publication of note, an Inquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe, was published in 1759. In 1764 The Traveler appeared, and at once placed him in the front rank of English authors. Two years after this he published the Vicar Of Wakefield, which has now charmed five generations, and which may be said to have indicated his proper rank in the literary world. In rapid succession he produced his other works: the comedy of the Good-Natured Man, in 1768; the Roman History, in 1769; and The Deserted Village — the sweetest of all his poems — in 1770. In 1773 his comedy She Stoops to Conquer was produced at Covent Garden with great applause. Although now in receipt of large sums for his works, Goldsmith had not escaped from pecuniary embarrassment. In 1774 he went to London, ill in body and harassed in mind, and took to bed on March 25th. He died April 4th, 2,000 pounds in debt, and more sincerely lamented than any other literary man of his time.

Gómez y Baez (gō'-mās ē bä'-ās), Maximo, Cuban patriot, was born in San Domingo, 1826. He served in the Spanish army in San Domingo and in Cuba, became disgusted with Spanish rule, and retired as a farmer. In the insurrection of 1868–78 he became a colonel and later commander in Puerto Príncipe of the insurgent forces, retiring to San Domingo after the war. In 1895, on the breaking out of the second revolution, he returned to Cuba, became general-in-chief of the Cuban army, and later put his force at the disposal of the American troops when they landed in Cuba. He aided the United States materially in the subsequent reorganization and reëstablishment of the civil government of the island. Died, 1905.

Gompers (gŏm'-pĕrz), Samuel, labor leader, president of the American federation of labor, was born in England, 1850. He is a cigar-maker by trade, and has been an advocate of the rights of labor, and connected with the efforts to organize the working people since his fifteenth year. He is one of the founders of the American federation of labor and editor of its official magazine; has written a number of pamphlets on the labor question and the labor movement, and, with an intermission of one year, has been president of the American federation of labor since 1882. In 1909 he visited various countries of Europe and wrote upon the labor situation as there found.

Goncourt (gôɴ'-ko͞or'), Edmond and Jules de, French novelists, born, the former at Nancy in 1822, the latter at Paris in 1830. Artists primarily, in 1849 they set out to traverse France for water-color sketches. Their notebooks made them writers as well as artists, and their literary partnership began in 1852. Their earliest serious works were a group of historical studies upon the second half of the eighteenth century. Of much more real value is Gavarni, L'Art au XVIIIeme siècle, and books on Watteau and Prud'hon. But the important work of the De Goncourt brothers commenced when they took to novel-writing. The first of these novels, Les Hommes de Lettres, was followed by Sœur Philomène, Renée Mauperin, Germinie Lacerteux, Manette Salomon, and Madame Gervaisais. The last is their greatest novel. After Jules' death in 1870, Edmond, who lived until 1896, issued the extraordinarily popular La fille Elisa, La Faustin, and Chérie.

Gonsalvo de Córdova (gōn-säl'-vō dā kōr'-dō-vä), "the great captain," Spanish commander, was born at Montilla near Cordova, Spain, 1453. He served with distinction against the Moors of Granada, and afterward in Portugal. Sent to assist Ferdinand II. of Naples against the French, 1495, he conquered the greater part of the kingdom of Naples, and expelled the French. When the partition of Naples was determined upon in 1500, Gonsalvo again set out for Italy, but first took Zante and Cephalonia from the Turks, and restored them to the Venetians. He then landed in Sicily, occupied Naples and Calabria, and demanded from the French that they should keep the compact. This demand being rejected, war was waged with varied success; but ultimately Gonsalvo won a great battle, and secured Naples to Spain. Recalled in 1506, and treated by the king with neglect, he withdrew to his estates in Granada, and died in 1515.

Goodale (go͝od'-āl), George Lincoln, botanist, professor of botany, 1878-88, Fisher professor of natural history and director of botanic garden, 1888-1909, Harvard; was born at Saco, Me., 1839. Goodyear, Charles, inventor of vulcanized rubber, was born in New Haven, Conn., 1800. His career was a troubled one. He failed as an iron-founder, and when, after ten years' labor, amidst every disadvantage of poverty and privation, he, in 1844, produced his new method of hardening rubber by means of sulphur, he became involved in a fresh series of troubles, as well as poverty, consequent on the infringement of his inventions. His patents latterly amounted to sixty, and both medals and honors were awarded him in London and Paris. Died, 1860.

Gordon, Charles George, British soldier, familiarly known as "Chinese Gordon," was born in 1833. He served in the Crimean war, 1854–56, and was wounded at Sebastopol; entered the Chinese service and assisted to suppress the "Tai-ping" rebellion, 1863-64, whence his sobriquet of "Chinese Gordon"; held several posts of distinction in the British army, and in 1875 took command of the forces destined to follow up Baker's African explorations, during which he totally suppressed the slave traffic on the Red sea. In 1884 he proceeded to the Soudan, in lower Egypt, as an emissary of England to quiet the insurgent tribes under El Mahdi, the "false prophet of the Soudan." His memorable journey to Khartoum, with one or two attendants, and the influence which his presence exercised over the tribes of the desert, is one of the most thrilling episodes in his career. He was killed when Khartoum was captured by El Mahdi, 1885.

Gordon, John Brown, American soldier, was born in Georgia, 1832. He was educated at the university of Georgia, studied law and was admitted to the bar. He served with distinction in the confederate army, 1861–64, and rose to the rank of lieutenant-general. From 1873 to 1879 and 1891 to 1897 he was a member of the United States senate; governor of Georgia, 1886–90. He wrote Reminiscences of the Civil War. Died, 1904.

Gordon-Cumming, Constance Frederica, Scotch traveler and writer, was born at Altyre, 1837, twelfth child of Sir William Gordon-Cumming, second baronet, Altyre and Gordonstoun. She was educated privately and at Fulham, London. An invitation to spend a year with a married sister in India, 1867, awoke the taste for travel and led to very extensive wandering extending over twelve years. Author: At Home in Fiji and New Zealand; A Lady's Cruise in a French Man-of-War among the South Sea Isles; Fire Fountains of Hawaii; Granite Crags of California; Wanderings in China; In the Hebrides; In the Himalayas; Via Cornwall to Egypt; Two Happy Years in Ceylon; Memories, etc. She invented the numeral-type for the use of illiterate Chinese, both blind and seeing, in Mandarin-speaking districts of China.

Gore, Christopher, American statesman and diplomat, was born in Boston, Mass., 1758. He was a graduate of Harvard, a lawyer by profession, and the first United States district attorney for Massachusetts. As one of the United States commissioners, he contributed largely to the settlement of the claims of this country upon Great Britain. He was governor of his state in 1809, and United States senator, 1814–17. He bequeathed the greater part of his property to Harvard college. Died, 1829.

Gore, Thomas Pryor, lawyer, United States senator, was born in Webster county, Miss., 1870. He lost the sight of both eyes by accident when a boy. He attended a local school at Walthall, Miss., graduated from the law department of Cumberland university, Lebanon, Tenn., 1892, moved to Texas in 1895 and to Oklahoma in 1901. After serving one term in the territorial senate, he was appointed United States senator by the governor, 1907, was elected by the legislature in the same year, and was reëlected 1909 for the full term 1909–15.

Görgei, or Görgey (gŭr′-gĕ-ĕ), Arthur, Hungarian general, was born at Toporcz in north Hungary, 1818. During the revolt of 1848 he compelled Jellachich and his 10,000 Croats to capitulate at Ozora, but was driven back by Windischgrätz. As Hungarian commander-in-chief he relieved Komorn by inflicting a series of severe defeats on the Austrians, practically driving them out of the country. Though almost constantly at feud with Kossuth and a provisional government, he in 1849 accepted the ministry of war. By unintelligible delays and jealousies he allowed the enemy to gain numerous advantages, and was himself repeatedly defeated. In August he was nominated dictator, and two days later surrendered with his army of 24,000 men to the Russian commander, Rüdiger, at Világos near Arad. Görgei was imprisoned at Klagenfurt, but eventually set at liberty. Kossuth accused him of treachery, a charge to which he replied in Mein Leben und Wirken in den Jahren 1848–49. He returned to Hungary in 1868.

Gorgias (gôr′-jĭ-ăs), celebrated Greek rhetorician of the time of Socrates, was born at Leontini about 487 B. C., and settled in Greece, residing for the most part at Athens, and at Larissa in Thessaly. He has been immortalized by Plato in a dialogue which bears his name. Two works attributed to him are extant, The Apology of Palamedes and the Encomium on Helena. Died about 380 B. C.

Gorky (gôr′-kē), Maxim, pen name of Alexei Maximovitch Pyeshkoff, a self-educated Russian novelist, was born in Nizhni-Novgorod, 1868 or 1869, the son of an upholsterer. After the death of his parents he was engaged in various occupations until, through the influence of his friend Kalushni, his attention was turned to literary work, and his first story, Makar Chudra, appeared in 1892. He is one of the most original and popular of modern Russian writers. Among his works are The Song of the Falcon; The Song of the Petrel; The Orloff Couple; Malva; Foma Gordeyeff; Children of the Sun, and The Barbarians.

Gorman, Arthur Pue, American politician, was born in Maryland, 1839. He was a page in the United States senate, 1852–66; collector of internal revenue, fifth district of Maryland, 1866–69; elected to legislature of Maryland, 1869; reëlected, 1871, and chosen speaker of the house; state senator, 1875–79, and United States senator, 1881–99, and 1903–06. He died at Washington, 1906.

Gortchakoff (gôr′-chă-kŏf′), Prince Alexander Mikhailovitch, Russian statesman, was born at St. Petersburg, 1798. As ambassador at Vienna, 1854–56, he displayed great ability during the Crimean war; he then succeeded Nesselrode as foreign minister. As chancellor of the empire, 1863, he was, until Bismarck's rise, the most powerful minister in Europe. His influence largely secured the neutrality of Austria in the Franco-German war of 1870, and he it was who in 1871 freed Russia from the treaty of Paris. After the conclusion of the Russo-Turkish war, the repudiation of the treaty of San Stefano, and the signing of the treaty of Berlin, his influence began to wane. He died at Baden-Baden, 1883.

Gosnold (gŏs′-nŭld), Bartholomew, English navigator, was born in England about the middle of the sixteenth century. He was associated with Sir Walter Raleigh in his attempt to found a colony in Virginia, and later headed an expedition fitted out by the earl of Southampton, to found a colony in New England. In 1602 he left Falmouth for this purpose with a ship and twenty colonists, attempting to cross the ocean in a direct line. Contrary winds took his vessel to the Azores, whence, after a tedious voyage of seven weeks, he reached the coast of Maine. Following the land-line in a southwesterly direction, he discovered Cape Cod and Martha's Vineyard. In 1606 Gosnold united with a company, of which Captain John Smith was one of the leaders, to locate in Virginia. Through their joint efforts the settlement at Jamestown was established in 1607. He died in Virginia, 1607.

Goss, Charles Frederic, American clergyman, novelist, was born in Meridian, N. Y., 1852. He was graduated at Hamilton college, 1873, D. D., 1898; was graduated at Auburn theological seminary, 1876. Goujon (gōō′-zhôɴ′), Jean, French sculptor and architect, was born in Paris about 1515. He was employed on the church of St. Maclou, at Rouen, 1540, and on the cathedral there, 1541; worked with Pierre Lescot, architect of the Louvre, on the restorations of St. Germain l'Auxerrois, 1542–44; was employed with Bullant on the Château d'Ecouen; and on the accession of Henry II. entered the royal service. In the Louvre he executed the reliefs of the Escalier Henri II., the carvings at the southwestern angle of the court, and the Tribune des Caryatides, and he was the author of what is considered the masterpiece of French sculpture, the "Diane Chasseresse," now in the Louvre collection. There is no direct evidence of his death, but it is believed to have occurred in the St. Bartholomew massacre, 1572.

Gould, Benjamin Apthorp, American astronomer, was born at Boston, Mass., 1824. He was graduated at Harvard college in 1844, afterward studied at Göttingen, where he took a degree in 1848, and was for some time an assistant in the observatory at Altona, Germany. After visiting the principal observatories in Europe, he returned to America and was employed in the coast survey, having in special charge the longitude determinations, the methods of which he greatly improved. In 1856 he was appointed director of the Dudley observatory, at Albany, N. Y., retaining that post until the beginning of 1859. In 1866 he established an observatory at Valentia in Ireland, and made the first determination of transatlantic longitude by telegraph cable. His principal works are: Report on the Discovery of the Planet Neptune; Smithsonian Institution Reports; Investigation of the Orbit of the Comet V.; Discussions of Observations Made by the United States Astronomical Expedition to Chili, to Determine the Solar Parallax; On the Transatlantic Longitude; Military and Anthropological Statistics of American Soldiers; and several charts of stars of scarcely less importance than those already noted. Died, 1896.

Married Finley J. Shepard of St. Louis, 1913.

Gould, Jay, American financier, was born at Roxbury, N. Y., 1836; was brought up on his father's farm; attended Hobart academy a short time, acquired a taste for mathematics and surveying; made surveys of Ulster, Albany, and Delaware counties, and began his railroad career shortly after the panic of 1857. He first invested in bonds of the Rutland and Washington railroad, and became president, treasurer, and superintendent of the road. Soon afterward he effected a consolidation of his road with the Rensselaer and Saratoga road, withdrew his capital, removed to New York, opened a broker's office, and began dealing in Erie stocks and bonds. In association with James Fisk, Jr., he entered the directory of the company, and was elected president, with Fisk as vice-president and treasurer. On the reorganization of the company, 1872, he lost official connection with it. He then invested heavily in the various Pacific railroads, secured control of a number of important lines, built branches, and effected combinations which resulted in the establishment of what is known as the "Gould system." He died in 1892, worth some $100,000,000.

Gould, John, English ornithologist, was born at Lyme Regis, 1804. He became curator of the zoölogical society's museum in 1827. His works include: A Century of Birds from the Himalaya Mountains; Icones Avium; The Birds of Europe; The Birds of Australia; The Mammals of Australia; The Family of Kangaroos; Humming Birds; The Birds of Great Britain, etc. Died, 1881.

Gounod (gōō′-nō′), Charles François, French operatic composer, was born in Paris in 1818. He studied music at the Paris conservatoire, and in 1839 gained the prize for composition. He then visited Rome and Vienna, and in 1849 became an organist in Paris. His first opera, Sappho, was written in 1851. This was followed by La Nonne Sanglante; Le Médicine malgré lui; La Colombe; Philémon et Baucis; Mireille; La Reine de Saba; Roméo et Juliette, and Faust — the two latter being the best known of his works. He was a member of the academy of fine arts, and was decorated with the legion of honor. In 1866 he was elected a member of the French institute. In 1882 his oratorio, La Rédemption, was produced; in 1885, Mors et Vita. Died, 1893.

Gowan, Sir James Robert, jurist, member of Canadian senate, was born in Ireland, 1815. He settled in Canada, 1832; served as volunteer in the rebellion, 1837; admitted to the upper Canada bar, 1839; appointed judge, 1843; one of the three judges appointed to frame a new procedure in re probate administration and guardianship, 1858; engaged in revision and consolidation of the whole statute law of United Canada and the provinces of upper and lower Canada (afterward enacted), 1859; chairman of board of judges, Ontario, 1869 to 1889; retired from bench, 1883, and was appointed by the crown a life member of the senate, 1885. He introduced a new procedure on bills of divorce before parliament, which was adopted and now governs in Canada. He was admitted to Irish bar, 1890, and created C. M. G., 1893, "in recognition of his long and valuable services in the Dominion of Canada." In 1855 he founded the Canada Law Journal. Died, 1909.

Graaf (grăf), Regnier de, Dutch physician and anatomist, was born in Schoonhoven, 1641. He was specially distinguished by his discovery that all animals are oviparous. The Graafian vesicles were also discovered and named after him, though he mistook their functions. He rendered great service to anatomy through his use of the injections into the blood-vessels which Swammerdam and Ruysch afterward brought to a state of comparative excellence. He was the author of a number of works on the functions of the pancreas and on the generative organs. Died 1673.

Gracchus (grăk'-ŭs), name of a distinguished Roman family, to which belonged the two celebrated tribunes, Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus (163–133 B. C.) and Caius Sempronius Gracchus (159–121 B. C.). The former was tribune of the plebs 133 B. C., and the latter 123-122 B. C. They were both the sons of Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus (who had been tribune of the plebs in 187 B. C.), and of Cornelia, the daughter of Publius Scipio Africanus the elder. Both the brothers fell victims to their zeal in attempting to contend with the growing corruptions of the Roman state.

Grady, Henry Woodfin, journalist, orator, was born at Athens, Ga., 1851. He was educated at the state university at Athens, and took a post-graduate course at the university of Virginia. He became editor of the Rome, Ga., Daily Commercial, and afterward of the Atlanta Herald. For some time he acted as southern correspondent of the New York Herald, and in 1880 became part owner and managing editor of the Atlanta Constitution, which he conducted until his death. He was an eloquent speaker, a man of broad and liberal views; and, during his brief public life, did as much as any one man could to advance the interests of Georgia and the South. Died at Atlanta, Ga., 1889.

Graetz, (grĕts), Heinrich, foremost Jewish historian of modern times, was born in Posen, 1817. Mostly self-educated; spent three years at Oldenburg, assistant and pupil of S. R. Hirsch; matriculated at Breslau in 1842. His principal work is Geschichte der Juden, begun in 1853, and completed in 1875; it has been translated into many languages. This work won for him the position of recognized master of Jewish history. He became professor at the university of Breslau in 1870. He died at Munich in 1891.

Grafly, Charles, American sculptor, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., 1862. He was educated at the Pennsylvania academy of fine arts, Philadelphia, and at the École des Beaux Arts, Paris; was a pupil of Chapu and Dampt. Since 1892 he has been instructor in sculpture at the Pennsylvania academy of fine arts, Philadelphia. His works include: "General Reynolds," Fairmount park, Philadelphia; "Fountain of Man," made for the Pan-American exposition at Buffalo; "From Generation to Generation"; "Symbol of Life"; "Vulture of War", and many portrait busts.

Graham, John, Viscount Dundee, Scottish writer, was born probably in 1649. After three years at St. Andrews, then four perhaps soldiering under Turenne, in 1672 he entered the prince of Orange horse-guards as cornet. In 1674 at the battle of Seneff he saved William's life; in 1677 he returned to Scotland, and became lieutenant in a troop of horse, and was ordered to enforce certain stringent laws against the Scottish covenanters. His severity provoked a rising of the covenanters, who defeated him at Drumclog, 1679. In 1689 he fought for James II. against William III., and gained the battle of Killiecrankie, but was mortally wounded. Died, 1689.

Graham, Thomas, Scottish chemist and physicist, was born in Glasgow, 1805. In 1830 he became professor of chemistry at Glasgow, and in 1837 at University college, London. In 1855 he was appointed master of the mint. His researches on the molecular diffusion of gases led him to formulate the law "that the diffusion rate of gases is inversely as the square root of their density." His valuable memoirs on the subject were collected in 1876; his Elements of Chemistry appeared in 1837. Died, 1869.

Grand, Sarah, assumed name of Frances Elizabeth Clarke, British novelist, was born in Ireland, of English parents; daughter of Edward John Bellenden Clarke, lieutenant R. N. She married at sixteen, brigade-surgeon Lieutenant-Colonel McFall, who died in 1898. She traveled for five years in the East, China, and Japan; wrote Ideala at twenty-six, and has since interested herself in the woman's movement. Author: Singularly Deluded; A Domestic Experiment; The Heavenly Twins; Our Manifold Nature; The Beth Book; The Modern Man and Maid; Babs the Impossible; Emotional Moments. She was vice-president of the Central and Western society for woman's suffrage, vice-president of the Scottish association for the promotion of women's public work, vice-president of Garden City association, etc.

Grant, Frederick Dent, United States army officer, was born at St. Louis, Mo., 1850, son of President Ulysses Simpson Grant. He was graduated from the United States military academy, 1871; commissioned second lieutenant 4th cavalry, 1871, and served on the frontier, 1873–81. Appointed United States minister to Austria by President Harrison, 1889; police commissioner of New York, 1894–98; appointed colonel of 14th New York infantry, 1898; brigadier-general of volunteers, 1899; appointed brigadier-general of United States army, 1901; major-general of United States army, 1906. Served in Puerto Rico one year, and after war commanded military district of San Juan; in Philippine islands, 1899–1902; commanded department of Texas, 1902–04, department of the lakes, January-September, 1904, department of the East, 1904–08. Died, 1912.

Grant, James, British military novelist, was born in Edinburgh, 1822. In 1832 he sailed with his father, an army officer, for Newfoundland. Home again in 1839, he became the next year an ensign in the British army, but in 1843 resigned and soon turned to literature. Having contributed copiously to the United Service Magazine and the Dublin University Magazine, he published in 1846 his Romance of War, the first of a long series of novels and histories, illustrative mainly of the achievements of Scottish arms abroad. Among his other works are: Adventures of an Aide-de-Camp; Frank Hilton, or the Queen's Own; Bothwell; The Yellow Frigate; Harry Ogilvie; Old and New Edinburgh. He died in London, 1887.

Grant, Robert, author, judge probate court and court of insolvency for Suffolk county, Mass., since 1893, was born at Boston, 1852. He was graduated at Harvard college, 1873; Ph. D., 1876; Harvard law school, 1879; was water commissioner, Boston, 1888–93. Author: The Confessions of a Frivolous Girl; The Little Tin Gods on Wheels (verse); The Lambs (verse); Yankee Doodle (verse); The Oldest School in America (verse); The Carletons; Mrs. Harold Stagg; An Average Man; The Knave of Hearts; A Romantic Young Lady; Face to Face; The Reflections of a Married Man; The Opinions of a Philosopher; The Art of Living; Search-Light Letters; Unleavened Bread; The Undercurrent; The Orchid; The Law-Breakers, etc. He has been an overseer of Harvard college since 1895.

Grant (Hiram), Ulysses Simpson, eighteenth president of the United States, was born at Point Pleasant, Clermont county, Ohio, 1822; graduated at the military academy of West Point in 1843, and served under General Taylor in the war with Mexico, 1846, up to the capture of Monterey. His regiment was then transferred to the expedition under General Scott, and he took part in every action from Vera Cruz to Mexico, and was brevetted first-lieutenant and captain for meritorious conduct at Molino del Rey and Chapultapec. In 1852 he served in Oregon; but in 1854 resigned his commission and settled in St. Louis, Mo., whence, in 1859, he moved to Galena, Ill., and engaged in the leather trade. At the beginning of the civil war in 1861, he volunteered his services, and was appointed colonel of an Illinois regiment. In August he was appointed brigadier-general, commanding the important post of Cairo, occupied Paducah, and led an expedition on the Mississippi. In February, 1862, he distinguished himself in the capture of Fort Donelson, on the Tennessee river, and was made major-general. On April 6th following, after a preliminary defeat, he won a great battle over the confederates at Pittsburg Landing, or Shiloh. Succeeding General Halleck in the West, he commanded the land forces which, in conjunction with the navy, reduced Vicksburg, July 4, 1863, soon followed by the fall of Fort Hudson, and the opening of the Mississippi. He then took command of the army of Tennessee, and defeated General Bragg at Chickamauga, in September of the same year; and in 1864, was appointed lieutenant-general and commander-in-chief, and personally directed the operations of the great final struggle in Virginia, in which the northern forces, though often repulsed with heavy losses, finally compelled the evacuation of Richmond, April 2, 1865, followed on the 9th by the surrender of the confederate army under General Lee, and soon after of the entire confederate forces. Congress, in recognition of his eminent services, passed an act reviving the grade of "general of the army of the United States," to which Grant was immediately appointed. In 1868 he was elected, on the republican platform, president of the United States; and having in 1872 been reëlected over a notable opponent, Horace Greeley of the New York Tribune, he retired in 1877 after his second term of office. In the latter year Grant visited Europe, and toured the world. In England and France he received an enthusiastic welcome. Simple, reticent, earnest, and persevering in his character, he owed his military success not so much to strategy as to superior numbers and resources, and hard fighting in which even a series of victories left his enemy less able to resist. During Grant's presidency a great reduction was made upon the national debt incurred during the civil war. The military government of the southern states in those years cannot be regarded as successful. The most important event connected with relations to foreign states was the settlement of the Alabama question by the joint high commission, in 1871. Having lost his moderate fortune in an unfortunate speculation, Grant wrote an account of his life, which, being successful, to some extent relieved him. He died of cancer, in 1885, after a year of severe suffering.

Gratianus (grā'-shĭ-ă'-nŭs), Augustus, Roman emperor from 375, was born in Sirmium, Pannonia, 359. In 367 by his father, Valentinian, he was made joint emperor in Gaul. On Valentinian's death he was elevated to the throne, with his half-brother, Valentinian II., as colleague. Gaul, Spain, and Britain fell to Gratianus' share, but as his brother was only four years old he virtually ruled the whole western empire; and in 378, on the death of his uncle, Valens, he suddenly became sovereign also of the eastern empire. Thereupon he recalled Theodosius from Spain, and appointed him his colleague in 379. Gratianus was pious, temperate, and eloquent; but his fondness for frivolous amusements and his persecution of pagans and heretics alienated his subjects, so that when Maximus was proclaimed emperor crowds flocked to his standard. Gratianus was defeated by him near Paris, and fled to Lyons, where he was put to death, 383.

Grattan (grăt'-an), Henry, Irish orator and statesman, was born in Dublin in 1746. He was educated at Trinity college, Dublin; in 1772 was admitted to the Irish bar, and in 1775 was returned to the Irish parliament. Mainly to him was owing, among other things, the partial abolition of the heavy restrictions on Irish commerce. In 1800 he was returned for the borough of Wicklow to oppose the union with England, and that was to fight for the people's idea of the constitution. But the union was effected in spite of him, and in 1805 he was returned to the imperial parliament for the borough of Malton, in Yorkshire. Next year he was induced to enter the race for parliament for Dublin, and was reëlected. As an orator he stands in the first rank. His style is full of point, rapidity, antithesis, and poetic suggestiveness. His eulogy on Chatham and his invective against Bonaparte are not surpassed in British eloquence. Died, 1820.

Graves, John Temple, journalist and orator, was born at Willington Church, Abbeville county, S. C., 1856. He was graduated at the university of Georgia, 1875; was editor of Daily Florida Union, Jacksonville, 1881–83; Atlanta (Ga.) Daily Journal, 1887-88; Tribune of Rome (Ga.), 1888–90; editor-in-chief and co-proprietor of Atlanta Daily Georgian, 1905–07; editor-in-chief of New York American since 1907. Presidential elector-at-large, Florida, 1884; was colonel on staff of Governor Northen of Georgia. Author: History of Florida of To-Day; Twelve Standard Lectures; Platform of To-Day; Speeches and Selections for Schools; The Negro. Contributor to various American periodicals as advocate of separation of black and white races, etc.

Gray, Asa, American botanist, was born at Paris, N. Y., 1810. He was graduated in medicine at Fairfield college, and in 1834 received the appointment of botanist of the United States exploring expedition. He was afterward appointed professor of botany in the university of Michigan; but before he had entered upon the duties of that office he was elected, in 1842, Fisher professor of natural history at Harvard university. In addition to his prelections at Cambridge he delivered some lectures at the Lowell institute in Boston. He ranked among the leading botanists, not only of America, but of the age. He wrote: Elements of Botany; Flora of North America; How Plants Grow; Field, Forest and Garden Botany; Darwiniana; Synoptical Flora of North America; Natural Science and Religion, etc. Died, 1888.

Gray, George, jurist, was born at New Castle, Del., 1840. He was graduated at Princeton, 1859, LL. D., 1889. Studied law at Harvard, and was admitted to the bar, 1863; practiced at New Castle, 1863–69; afterward at Wilmington; attorney-general of Delaware, 1879–85; United States senator, 1885–99; in 1896 affiliated with national gold-standard democrats in presidential election; member of peace commission, Paris, 1898; appointed by the president a member of the joint high commission at Quebec, 1898; made member of the international permanent court of arbitration under The Hague convention, 1906, reappointed, 1913; judge of United States circuit court, third judicial circuit, since 1899; chairman of anthracite coal strike commission, 1902.

Gray, Horace, American jurist, was born at Boston, 1828; was graduated at Harvard, 1845, and its law school, 1849; was admitted to the bar, 1851; appointed reporter of the Massachusetts supreme court, 1854, and served until 1862; associate-justice of the Massachusetts supreme court, 1864–73, and chief-justice, 1873–81, when he was appointed successor to Judge Clifford in the United States supreme court. He remained a member of this tribunal until shortly before his death, 1902.

Gray, John Chipman, lawyer, educator, was born at Brighton, Mass., 1839; graduated at Harvard, 1859, LL. B., 1861; LL. D., Yale and Harvard. Admitted to bar, 1862, but in same year entered army and served, 1862–65, from lieutenant to major and judge-advocate of United States volunteers. Since the war he has continuously engaged in the practice of law in Boston. Lectured at Harvard law school, 1869–71; Story professor of law, 1875–83, and Royall professor of law since 1883, in same school. Author: Restraints on Alienation; The Rule Against Perpetuities; Select Cases and Other Authorities on the Law of Property (6 vols.), etc.

Gray, Thomas, English poet, was born in London, 1716. He was educated at Cambridge, and appointed professor of history and modern languages there in 1768. He had a just appreciation of the natural beauty of his native country, made notes wherever he went, and wrote copious descriptions of what he had seen to his literary friends. He published his Ode to Eton College in 1747, and his Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard, by which he is best known, several years afterward. On the death of Colley Cibber he was offered, but declined, the post of poet laureate. Died, 1771.

Greeley, Horace, American journalist, was born at Amherst, N. H., 1811. He entered a printing office as an apprentice at East Poultney, Vt., 1826. On the completion of his apprenticeship he worked for some time as a journeyman printer, and in 1834 founded the New Yorker, a literary weekly paper, for which he wrote essays, poetry, and other articles. After one or two other attempts at editorship he founded, in 1841, the New York Tribune, and became the leading editor. As he had adopted, to some extent, the social theories of Fourier, he was joined by the most able writers of that school of socialism — the paper published as a joint-stock concern, being held in shares by its writers and others engaged in its publication. The Tribune under his editorship was also an earnest advocate of temperance, woman's rights, the abolition of slavery and capital punishment, and other reforms, and was recognized as the organ of the extreme or radical republican party. In 1848 he was elected to congress from one of the districts of New York, for the short term, but failed in his congressional career by agitating an unwelcome reform in the mileage payments to members. In 1851 he visited Europe. His aspirations to political position were defeated by the more conservative party leaders, and he, in turn, influenced the election of Lincoln instead of Seward, in 1860. On the secession of several of the southern states from the Union, Greeley at first admitted their right to secede, in accordance with the principles of the declaration of independence; but, when the war began, he became its most zealous advocate, and is supposed to have caused the premature advance that resulted in the defeat at Bull Run, 1861. In 1872 he was an unsuccessful candidate for the presidency. Died, 1872.

Greely, Adolphus Washington, American general, was born at Newburyport, Mass., 1844. Entering the volunteer service, he attained the rank of captain during the civil war, and at its close was transferred to the regular army with the rank of lieutenant. In 1868 he was placed in the signal service, and in 1881 was assigned to the command of the Lady Franklin bay expedition to northern Greenland. After suffering extreme and terrible hardships, Greely and a few surviving members of his command were rescued in 1884, by an expedition sent to his relief by the United States government. He published an account of the expedition in 1885, under the title of Three Years of Arctic Service. In 1887 became chief of United States signal service, and was head of the weather bureau from that time until it passed under control of the department of agriculture. Major-general, 1906.

Green, Anna Katharine, pseudonym of Anna Katharine Green Rohlfs, American novelist, was born at Brooklyn, N. Y., 1846. She is the daughter of James Wilson Green, a lawyer, and was educated at Ripley college, Poultney, Vt. She married Charles Rohlfs in 1884. Author: The Leavenworth Case; A Strange Disappearance; The Sword of Damocles; The Defense of the Bride; Hand and Ring; X, Y, Z; The Mill Mystery; The Doctor, His Wife, and the Clock; That Affair Next Door; Lost Man's Lane; Agatha Webb; Risifi's Daughter, a drama; A Difficult Problem, and Other Stories; The Circular Study; One of My Sons; The Filigree Ball; House in the Mist; The Millionaire Baby; The Amethyst Box; The Woman in the Alcove; The Chief Legatee; The Mayor's Wife; The House of the Whispering Pines, etc.

Green, Hetty Howland Robinson, American financier, was born in New Bedford, Mass., 1835, daughter of Edward Mott Robinson, who died in 1865, leaving her a large fortune. She was educated at Mrs. Lowell's school, Boston; she married Edward H. Green, 1867, who died in 1902. She is said to be the richest woman in America, and probably the greatest woman financier in the world. She personally manages her large property in stocks, bonds, and real estate in Chicago, New York, and elsewhere.

Green, John Richard, English historian, was born at Oxford, England, 1837, and educated at Magdalen College school and Jesus college. He took orders in 1860, and was for some time vicar of St. Philip's, Stepney, becoming in 1869 librarian at Lambeth. Author: A Short History of the English People; A History of the English People; The Making of England, and The Conquest of England. The latter was published after his death by his wife, who assisted him in various works, and herself wrote Henry II. in the Twelve English Statesmen series. Died, 1883.

Green, Thomas Hill, English philosopher, was born in Yorkshire, 1836. Educated at Rugby and Balliol college, Oxford, he in 1860 was elected to a Balliol fellowship, and reëlected in 1872, becoming also its first lay tutor in 1866. He married a sister of J. A. Symonds in 1871, became in 1877 Whyte professor of moral philosophy. Green's noble character, contagious enthusiasm, philosophical profundity, and strong interest in social questions drew around him many of the best men at Oxford. Popular education and temperance lay near his heart. In 1874 he contributed his masterly introduction to the Clarendon press edition of Hume's Treatise on Human Nature, subjecting Hume's philosophy in detail to searching and hostile analysis from an idealist point of view. His Prolegomena to Ethics, left incomplete at his death, was edited by A. C. Bradley, and two "lay-sermons" by Arnold Toynbee in the same year. His scattered essays in Mind and elsewhere were edited as The Works of T. H. Green by R. L. Nettleship. He died in 1882.

Green, William Henry, American Presbyterian theologian, was born at Groveville, N. J., 1825. He was graduated from Lafayette college, 1840, and at Princeton theological seminary, 1846. In 1851 he was made professor of biblical and oriental literature at Princeton, and was chairman of the committee which revised the old testament. He wrote: A Grammar of the Hebrew Language; Moses and the Prophets; The Hebrew Feasts, etc. Died at Princeton, N. J., 1900.

Greene, Francis Vinton, American army officer and author, was born at Providence, R. I., 1850. He was graduated at West Point, 1870; was assigned to engineer corps; served on international commission for survey of northern boundary of United States as assistant astronomer and surveyor, 1872–76; military attaché of United States legation, St. Petersburg, 1877–79; was with Russian army in Turkey, 1877-78; present at battles of Schipka, Plevna, Sophia, Philipopolis, and minor engagements. He was engineer in charge of public works in Washington, 1879-80; professor of practical military engineering, West Point, 1885. Served in Spanish war as colonel of 71st New York volunteers at Tampa, 1898; as brigadier-general in Manila campaign, and was promoted to major-general for services in capture of Manila. He was chairman of committee on canals, New York, 1899, and police commissioner, New York city, 1903-04. President of Niagara, Lockport, and Ontario power company, and vice-president of Ontario power company of Niagara Falls. Author: The Russian Army and Its Campaigns in Turkey; Army Life in Russia; The Mississippi Campaigns of the Civil War; Life of Nathanael Greene, Major-General in the Army of the Revolution; and numerous magazine articles.

Greene, Nathanael, American general, was born in 1742, at Potowhommet, Warwick county, Rhode Island. In 1770 he was chosen a member of the Rhode Island assembly, and, to the great scandal of his fellow Quakers, was among the first to engage in the military exercises preparatory to resisting the mother country. In 1774 he enlisted as private, and in 1775 was appointed to the command of the Rhode Island contingent to the army at Boston, with the rank of brigadier-general. He was promoted to major-general in 1776, and distinguished himself at the engagements of Trenton and Princeton. At the battle of Brandywine, he commanded a division, and by his skillful movements saved the American army from utter destruction; and at Germantown he commanded the left wing. In 1778 he became quartermaster-general. In 1780 he succeeded Gates in the command of the army of the South. Gates had just been completely defeated by Cornwallis, and Greene found the army in a wretched state, without discipline, clothing, arms, or spirit. By dint of great activity he got his army into better condition, and remained on the defensive for the remainder of the year. In 1781 he had a successful skirmish with an English detachment, but, drawing upon himself the whole army of Cornwallis, much his superior in numbers, he made a masterly and successful retreat. With 5,000 new recruits, he entered upon more active operations, and finally defeated the English at Eutaw Springs, the hardest-fought field of the revolution, which put an end to the war in South Carolina. Congress struck and presented to him a medal in honor of this battle, and the Carolinas and Georgia made him valuable grants of land. When peace was restored in 1783, Greene returned to Rhode Island, where he received numerous testimonials of the public admiration. In 1785 he retired with his family to his estate in Georgia, where he died of sunstroke in 1786. He was one of the very best generals of the war of independence, second, perhaps, only to Washington, whose intimate friend he was.

Greenough (grēn′-ō), Horatio, American sculptor, was born in Boston, Mass., 1805. He graduated at Harvard in 1825, and from that year till 1851 lived chiefly in Italy. His principal work is the colossal statue of Washington formerly in front of the capitol. Others are "Medora," "Venus Victrix," and a group of four figures, "The Rescue." He died at Somerville, Mass., 1852.

Greer, David Hummell, Protestant Episcopal clergyman, bishop, was born at Wheeling, W. Va., 1844. He was graduated at Washington college, Pa., 1862; studied theology at Protestant Episcopal seminary, Gambier, Ohio; D. D., Brown university, Kenyon college, university of the South; LL. D., Washington and Jefferson college; S. T. D., Columbia; was ordained deacon, 1866, priest, 1868; rector Grace church, Providence, R. I., 1871–88, St. Bartholomew's church, New York, 1888–1904; bishop coadjutor, diocese of New York, 1903–08, bishop since 1908. Author: The Historic Christ; From Things to God; The Preacher and His Place; Visions, etc.

Grégoire (grā′-gwär′), Henri, French ecclesiastic and revolutionist, was born near Lunéville, 1750. He took orders and lectured at the Jesuit college of Pont-à-Mousson. His Essai sur la Régénération des Juifs became widely popular. Curé of Emberménil in Lorraine, and an ardent democrat, he was sent to the states-general of 1789 as a deputy of the clergy, attached himself to the tiers-état party, and acted a prominent part throughout the revolution. He was the first of his order to take the oaths, and was elected "constitutional bishop" of Loire-et-Cher. He exercised a stern democracy which he identified with the Christian brotherhood of the gospel. At the blasphemous feast of reason he refused, in the face of the infuriated rabble, to renounce Christianity. He became a member of the constituent assembly, 1789, but the concordat forced him to resign his bishopric. He died at Paris, unreconciled with the church, 1831. Among his works are Histoire des Sectes Religieuses and L'Église Gallicane.

Gregorovius (grĕg′-ō-rō′-vĭ-ŭs), Ferdinand, German historian, was born at Neidenburg in East Prussia, 1821. He studied theology, but devoted himself to poetry and literature; in 1852 settled in Rome, and died at Munich, 1891. His great work — the standard work on the subject — is the History of the City of Rome in the Middle Ages. He wrote also on Italian geography and history, on Corsica, Capri, the graves of the popes, Lucrezia Borgia, Urban VIII., Athens, Corfu, and the Byzantine empress, Athenais; also a tragedy on the death of Tiberius, and an epic, Euphorion.

Gregory I., Pope, called "the great," was born in Rome about 540. He was appointed governor of Rome, but, on inheriting his father's wealth, resigned it, and became abbot of St. Andrew's, Rome. After being secretary to Pelagius II., he succeeded him as bishop of Rome; renounced communion with the eastern Christians because of the assumption of the title "universal bishop" by the patriarch of Constantinople; composed chants, and established a musical school, in which he himself taught, and collected and arranged fragments of ancient hymns. He was the author of numerous sacred works, of which the chief was his Morals from the Book of Job. Died, 604.

Gregory VII. See page 223.

Grenville, George, English statesman, was born in 1712. He entered parliament in 1741, in 1762 became secretary of state and first lord of the admiralty, and in 1763 succeeded Lord Bute as prime minister. In his administration befell the American stamp act, which excited the American colonies to resistance. He resigned in 1765. Died, 1770.

Gresham (grĕsh'-am), Sir Thomas, English financier, philanthropist, was born at London in 1519. From Cambridge in 1543 he became connected with the Mercers company, and in 1551 was employed as king's agent at Antwerp. In two years he paid off a heavy loan and restored the king's credit. As a Protestant he was dismissed by Queen Mary, but was soon reinstated. He was knighted by Queen Elizabeth in 1559, and was for a time ambassador at Brussels. The troubles in the Netherlands compelled him in 1567 to withdraw from Antwerp, to which city he had made more than forty journeys on state service; in one in 1560 he was thrown from his horse and lamed for life. In 1569, by his advice, the state borrowed money from London merchants instead of from foreigners. Having in 1564 lost his only son, Richard, in 1566–71 he devoted a portion of his great wealth to building an exchange, in imitation of that of Antwerp; he made provision for founding Gresham college, and left money for eight almshouses. Died, 1579.

Gresham, Walter Quinton, American politician and jurist, was born in Harrison county, Ind., 1832. He was admitted to the bar in 1853; was elected to the state legislature in 1860, but resigned to accept a commission in an Indiana regiment. He was severely wounded near Atlanta and received the brevet of major-general of volunteers for his gallantry. In 1869 he was appointed United States judge for the district of Indiana by President Grant, but in April, 1882, resigned from the bench to become postmaster-general under President Arthur. On the death of Secretary Folger, in 1884, he became secretary of the treasury. In October, 1884, he was appointed United States judge for the seventh circuit. In 1893 he became secretary of state in President Cleveland's cabinet. Died at Washington, 1895.

Greuze (grûz), Jean Baptiste, French painter, was born at Tournus near Mâcon, France, 1725. He studied under Gromdon at Lyons, and at the academy in Paris. His first notable works were historical; after a visit to Italy, 1755, he painted Italian subjects; but he is seen at his best in such studies of girls as "The Broken Pitcher," the "Girl with Doves," and "Girl with Dead Canary." His art, though full of delicacy and grace, is marred by its triviality and pursuit of mere prettiness. Died, 1805.

Grévy (grā'-vē'), François Paul Jules, French statesman, was born at Mont-sous-Vaudrey, in the Jura, near the boundary of Switzerland, 1807, and attended school and college near his native place. When not yet twenty years of age he began his law studies at the capital, and, becoming interested in politics, took part in the revolution of 1830, which drove Charles X. from the French throne. In 1848, when Louis Philippe was dethroned, and a republican government set up, Grévy became prominent. The voters of his old department, the Jura, elected him to represent them in the constituent assembly of 1848, and he took a prominent part in the organization of the government. Opposed to Louis Napoleon as president, and still more bitterly against him as emperor, Grévy was obliged to keep out of public affairs from 1852 to 1868. After Napoleon's downfall, he was chosen president of the national assembly which met in 1871, and in 1873, when the young republic seemed to be headed toward another monarchy, Grévy earnestly advocated democracy as the only hope of France. In 1876, 1877, and 1879 he again represented the Jura in the French parliament, and in the latter year was chosen president of the republic by an enormous majority. In 1885 he was reëlected, but on account of a scandal in which his son-in-law was implicated he was forced to resign, 1887. Died, 1891.

Grey, Albert Henry George, fourth Earl Grey, English statesman and administrator, governor-general of Canada, 1904–11, was born in 1851. He is the son of General Charles Grey; was educated at Harrow and Trinity college, Cambridge, and succeeded his uncle, the third Earl Grey, in 1894. He was a liberal member of the house of commons, 1880–85; administrator of Rhodesia, 1896–97; director of British South Africa company, 1898–1904; was lord-lieutenant of Northumberland, 1899–1904. He succeeded his brother-in-law, Lord Minto, as governor-general of Canada in 1904.

Grey, Charles, second Earl Grey, English statesman, was born at Falloden, Northumberland, 1764, and educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge. He became a whig member of parliament for Northumberland, 1786, was one of the managers of the impeachment of Warren Hastings, and in 1792 helped to found the society of the friends of the people. In 1806 Grey, now Lord Howick, became first lord of the admiralty, and, on the death of Fox, foreign secretary and leader of the house of commons. In 1807 he succeeded his father as second Earl Grey. He opposed the clamor for a renewal of the American war in 1815, denounced the coercive measures of the government, condemned the bill against Queen Caroline, defended the right of public meeting, and supported the enlightened commercial policy of Huskisson. In 1830 he formed a government whose policy, he said, would be one of peace, retrenchment, and reform. The first reform bill was produced in 1831; its defeat led to a dissolution and the return of a parliament still more devoted to reform. Early in 1832 another bill was carried in the commons, and it weathered the second reading in the house of lords; but when a motion to postpone the disfranchising clauses was adopted, ministers resigned. The duke of Wellington failed to form an administration, and Grey returned to office with power to create a sufficient number of peers to carry the measure. Wellington now withdrew his opposition, and in June the reform bill passed the house of lords. Grey was the chief of a powerful party in the first reformed parliament. He carried the act for the abolition of slavery in the colonies, as well as a number of minor reforms; but dissensions sprang up, and in consequence of his Irish difficulties he resigned in 1834. He died at Howick House, Alnwick, 1845.

Grey, Sir Edward, English statesman, secretary of state for foreign affairs since 1905; member of parliament for Berwick-on-Tweed since 1885; was born in 1862. He was graduated at Balliol college, Oxford, and succeeded to the baronetcy in 1882; was under-secretary for foreign affairs, 1892–95. He is a man of brilliant talents of whom Gladstone is alleged to have said: "I have never remembered so signal a capacity for parliamentary life and so small a disposition to it."

Grey, Lady Jane, eldest daughter of Henry Grey, marquis of Dorset, afterward duke of Suffolk, and of Lady Frances Brandon, was born at Bradgate, Leicestershire, 1537. In 1553, after the fall of Somerset, the dukes of Suffolk and Northumberland, now ruling in the name of the youthful King Edward VI., and foreseeing his speedy death, determined to change the succession to the crown, and secure it to their own families. Lady Jane Grey, now sixteen years old, was therefore married to Lord Guilford Dudley, fourth son of the duke of Northumberland, in May, 1553. The king, failing in body and weak in mind, and surrounded by selfish or fanatical advisers, was persuaded to make a deed of settlement, setting aside the right of succession of his sisters Mary and Elizabeth, and Mary, queen of Scots, leaving the crown to Lady Jane, who was innocent of the conspiracy. After the king's death her ambitious relatives hailed her as "queen." Lady Jane at first shrank from honor so treacherously won, but ultimately yielded herself to force of their treaties and commands, and allowed herself to be proclaimed. The people of England resented the unscrupulous conduct of Suffolk and Northumberland, and, learned, brilliant, and amiable as Lady Jane was, they rallied round Mary. Northumberland was defeated, sent to the Tower, and beheaded August 22, 1554; and in the following November Lady Jane and her husband were also condemned and she was executed in February, 1554.

Grieg (grēg), Edvard Hagerup, Norwegian composer, was born at Bergen, Norway, 1843. In 1858 he began a four years' course of study at Leipzig, and in 1863 continued his studies at Copenhagen. His nationality became a strong element even in his earliest compositions. He spent the winter of 1865-66 and some months of 1870 in Rome where he inaugurated a Norse music concert. In 1888 he went to London, where he both played and conducted, and this was followed by important engagements in Germany and elsewhere. Among his compositions are numerous pieces for the piano, songs, dances, and an opera. He died in 1907.

Griffis (grĭf'-ĭs), William Elliot, lecturer, author, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., 1843. He served with the 44th Pennsylvania regiment in the civil war, 1863; graduated at Rutgers, 1869; Union theological seminary, 1877; D. D., Union college, 1884; L. H. D., Rutgers college, 1899. In 1870 he went to Japan to organize schools; was superintendent of education in the province of Echizen, 1871; professor of physics, Imperial university, Tokio, 1872–74. Pastor of First Reformed church, Schenectady, N. Y., 1877–86; Shawmut Congregational church, Boston, 1886–93; 1893–1903, First Congregational church, Ithaca, N. Y. M., 1890; special studies, university of Berlin; was instructor of English literature and professor of literature, Indiana university; professor of ethics and later head of combined departments of ethics and education, Leland Stanford Jr. university; public lecturer since 1899. Author: The New Humanism; A Book of Meditations; Moral Education, etc.

Griggs, James M., congressman, lawyer, was born in Lagrange, Ga., 1861 He was graduated at Peabody normal college, Nashville, Tenn., 1881; taught school, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1883. He practiced at Alapaha, Berrien county, Ga.; was for a short time in newspaper business; removed to Dawson, Ga., 1885; solicitor-general (prosecuting attorney) Pataula judicial circuit, 1888–93; judge of same circuit, 1893–96; member of congress, 1897–1909, second Georgia district; chairman of democratic congressional committee, 1902. Died, 1910, Griggs, John William, lawyer, United States attorney-general, 1898–1901, was born at Newton, N. J., 1849. He was graduated at Lafayette college, 1868; admitted to bar, 1871; practiced at Paterson; member of New Jersey general assembly, 1876–77; state senator, 1882–88; president of New Jersey senate, 1886; governor of New Jersey, January, 1896, until he resigned, January, 1898, to take office of attorney-general in President McKinley's cabinet; made member of Hague permanent court of arbitration, 1906.

Grillparzer (grĭl'-pär-tsĕr), Franz, Austrian dramatic poet, was born at Vienna, 1791. He studied jurisprudence, and in 1813 entered the imperial civil service, in which he remained until 1856. He first attracted notice in 1817 by a tragedy, Die Ahnfrau, which was followed by Sappho; Das goldene Vlies; Des Meeres und der Liebe Wellen; Der Traum ein Leben, etc. He produced in lyric poetry much meritorious work; and one good prose novel, Der Arme Spielmann. Died at Vienna, 1872.

Grimm, Friedrich Melchior, Baron von, German-French critic and writer, was born at Ratisbon, 1723. After studying at Leipzig, and failing with a tragedy, he accompanied a nobleman to Paris, and became reader to the crown-prince of Saxe-Gotha. He became acquainted with Rousseau in 1749, and through him with Diderot, Holbach, and Madame d'Epinay. His connection with the encyclopedists, added to his own acquirements, opened up a brilliant career. He became secretary to the duke of Orleans, and began to write for several German princes those famous literary bulletins, which for nearly forty years gave the most trenchant criticism of all important French books. In 1776 he was made a baron by the duke of Gotha, and appointed minister-plenipotentiary at the French court. At the revolution he withdrew to Gotha, and afterward to the court of Catharine II., whence he was sent in 1795 as Russian minister to Hamburg. He died at Gotha, 1807.

Grimm, Jakob Ludwig Karl, German philologist and antiquary, was born at Hanau, in Hesse-Cassel, 1785. Though holding at various times important public offices, his life was devoted to philological and antiquarian studies. His German Grammar, in four volumes, is perhaps the greatest philological work of the age. After 1814, in company with his brother, Wilhelm, he published numerous works of a more popular character, the best known of which is Kinder- und Hausmärchen, nursery and fireside stories. From 1830 to 1837 they were joint professors at Göttingen, subsequently joint librarians at Cassel, and in 1841 settled in Berlin at the invitation of the king of Prussia. The greatest joint undertaking of the two brothers was the Deutsche Wörterbuch, begun in 1852. Jakob Grimm died in 1863. Wilhelm was born in 1786 and died at Berlin in 1859.

Grimston (grĭm′-stŭn), Mrs. Margaret B. See Kendal, Mrs.

Grimston, William H. See Kendal, Mr.

Gros (grō), Antoine Jean, Baron, French historical painter, was born at Paris, 1771. He studied in the school of David, and acquired celebrity by his great pictures of Napoleon's battles, "Francis I. and Charles V. at Saint Denis," "Departure of Louis XVIII. for Ghent," "The Plague at Jaffa," and "Embarkation of the Duchess of Angoulême." He drowned himself in the Seine, 1835.

Gross (grōs), Charles, historian, was born at Troy, N. Y., 1857. He was graduated at Williams, 1878; Ph. D., Göttingen, 1883; A. M., Harvard, 1901; LL. D., Williams, 1904. He engaged in literary work in England, 1884–88; instructor at Harvard, 1888–1909. Author: Gilda Mercatoria; The Exchequer of the Jews of England in the Middle Ages; The Gild Merchant; Select Cases from the Coroners' Rolls; Sources and Literature of English History. Translator: Lavisse's Political History of Europe, Kayserling's Christopher Columbus. He was a frequent contributor to American Historical Review, and other historical journals. Died, 1909.

Gross, Samuel David, American surgeon, was born in Pennsylvania, 1805. He was graduated from Jefferson medical college, 1828; was professor of pathological anatomy in Cincinnati medical college, 1835–40; professor of surgery in university of Louisville, 1840–50, and at university of New York, 1850-51; professor of surgery in Jefferson medical college, 1856–84. He wrote: System of Surgery (2 vols.), American Medical Biography, etc. He was the founder and chief editor of the North American Medico-Chirurgical Review, and was president of the American medical association, 1867. He wrote extensively for medical publications, and made many valuable contributions to operative surgery. Died, 1884.

Grosscup (grōs′-kŭp), Peter Stenger, jurist, judge of United States circuit court of appeals, 7th circuit, 1899-1905, was born at Ashland, Ohio, 1852. He was graduated from Wittenberg college, 1872, Boston law school, 1874; practiced law at Ashland, Ohio, 1874–83, where he was city solicitor for six years; practiced in Chicago, 1882–92; United States judge of northern district of Illinois, 1892–99. He has been president of the John Crerar library, Chicago, since 1901.

Grosvenor (grō′-ve-nẽr), Charles Henry, lawyer, ex-congressman, was born in Pomfret, Conn., 1833. He went to Ohio in 1838, taught school, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1857; engaged in practice; served in eighteenth Ohio volunteers, 1861–65, as major, lieutenant-colonel, and brevet brigadier-general. Member of Ohio legislature, 1874–78 (speaker, two years); presidential elector, 1872 and 1880; trustee of Ohio soldiers' and sailors' orphans' home, 1880–88, and president for five years; member of congress, 1885–91, and again from 1893 to 1907, eleventh Ohio district. Author: The Hippodrome of Constantinople; Constantinople (2 vols.); The Permanence of the Greek Type; Contemporary History, etc.

Grote (grōt), George, English historian and politician, was born at Clay Hill, Kent, England, 1794. He was educated at the Charterhouse, entered the family banking house, but devoted his leisure time to literary work. He published many pamphlets on reform, and contributed to the Westminster Review. In 1832 he was elected to parliament for the city of London, for which he continued to sit until 1841, as one of the "philosophical radicals." His History of Greece appeared between 1846 and 1856, and was followed by Plato and Other Companions of Socrates. During his parliamentary life he made himself conspicuous by his advocacy of the ballot. He took an active part in the foundation of the university of London, of which, at the time of his death, he was vice-chancellor. He died in 1871, and is buried in Westminster abbey.

Grotius (grō′-shĭ-ŭs), or De Groot, Hugo. See page 443.

Grouchy (gro͞o′-shē′), Emmanuel, Marquis de, distinguished French marshal, was born in Paris, 1766. He entered the French army, 1781, was a lieutenant in the royal body-guard, 1787–93, served with Lafayette, was promoted brigadier-general, commanded the cavalry in the army of the Alps, aided in the conquest of Savoy, and after fighting in La Vendée, 1794, was cashiered with all other officers of the nobility. He then enlisted as a private soldier, and after the fall of Robespierre was reinstated and promoted general of division by a special decree. In 1798 he persuaded the king of Sardinia to abdicate and surrender Piedmont to France; in 1799 received fourteen wounds and was taken prisoner at Novi; gained his liberty after Marengo, served with Moreau on the Rhine, and was promoted inspector-general of cavalry; defeated the Prussian cavalry at Zehdenik, 1806; was governor of Madrid, 1808, took part in the battle of Wagram, 1809, distinguished himself at Borodino, 1812, and commanded Napoleon's body-guard on the retreat from Moscow. On the restoration of the Bourbons he was banished from France, but in 1815 was permitted to return. When Napoleon reappeared from Elba, Grouchy was given a command and made a marshal of France for his successes in the north. He then marched into Belgium, defeated the allied English and Prussian armies at Fleurus and Ligny, and by following Napoleon's orders to the letter to pursue Blücher is believed to have caused the French defeat at Waterloo. He was again banished by the Bourbons, lived five years in Philadelphia, was recalled to France, 1819, and after the revolution of 1830 was restored to rank as marshal and created a peer. Died, 1847.

Grove, Sir George, British engineer and writer on music, was born at Clapham, 1820. He was trained as a civil engineer, erected in the West Indies the first two cast-iron lighthouses, and assisted in the Britannia tubular bridge, which unites Anglesey and Wales. He was secretary to the society of arts, 1849–52, and then secretary and director of the Crystal Palace. He was editor of Macmillan's Magazine, a large contributor to Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, editor and part author of the great Dictionary of Music and Musicians, and published a work on Beethoven. He was made D. C. L. by Durham, LL. D. by Glasgow, and was knighted in 1883 on the opening of the royal college of music, of which he was director until 1895. He died in 1900.

Grove, Sir William Robert, English lawyer and physicist, was born at Swansea, 1811. He studied at Oxford, was admitted to the bar, raised to the bench, 1871, knighted, 1872, and in 1875–87 was a judge in the high court of justice. He greatly distinguished himself in the subjects of electricity and optics, and was professor of natural science at the London institution in 1840–47. In 1839 he invented the powerful voltaic battery known by his name. He published very important lectures, as those on the Progress of Physical Science, in which he propounded the theory of the mutual convertibility of the natural forces; the Correlation of the Physical Forces; Voltaic Ignition, and the Continuity of Natural Phenomena. He died in 1896.

Grundtvig (grônt'-vēg), Nikolai Frederik Severin, Danish poet and theologian, was born at Udby in Zealand, 1783. He first became known by his Northern Mythology, published in 1808, and Decline of the Heroic Age in the North, in 1809. These were followed by the Rhyme of Roeskilde and the Roeskilde Saga, and by a collection of patriotic songs. About this time he took his stand against the current rationalism, and became the head of a religious school, which strove to free the church from state interference; but from 1826 to 1839, for an attack on a conspicuous rationalist, was suspended from preaching. In 1818 he had begun the translation of Snorri Sturluson and Saxo Grammaticus; in 1820 published a Danish translation of Beowulf. After 1861 he had the title of bishop, though he held no see. He died in 1872.

Grundy (grŭn'-dĭ), Felix, American jurist and statesman, was born in Berkeley county, W. Va., 1777. In 1799 he was chosen a member of the Kentucky constitutional convention, and from that time until 1806 served as a member of the legislature. He was appointed judge of the supreme court of errors and appeals in 1806; in 1807, became chief-justice. In 1808 he removed to Nashville, Tenn.; in 1811 was sent to congress, and reëlected in 1813. In 1819 he was a member of the legislature of Tennessee; in 1820 a commissioner to fix the boundary line between Tennessee and Kentucky, and in 1829 became United States senator, to fill the unexpired term of John H. Eaton. Later he was elected to fill that place as a partisan of Andrew Jackson. In 1838 he served for a few months as United States attorney-general during the administration of Martin Van Buren; resigning this office he was immediately reëlected to the United States senate. Died at Nashville, Tenn., 1840.

Grunsky, Carl Ewald, civil engineer, was born in San Joaquin county, Cal., 1855; graduated at Stockton, Cal., high school, 1870, Realschule, Stuttgart, Germany, 1872–74; Polytechnikum, Stuttgart, 1874–77, graduated at head of class. His first professional work was as topographer with river surveying party of state engineering department of California, 1878; assistant and chief assistant state engineer of California, 1879–88; in private practice, on irrigation work, sewerage and drainage, 1887–99; at work on river rectification and drainage problems as member examining commission on rivers and harbors of California, 1889–90, and as consulting engineer to commissioner of public works of California, 1893-94; member of San Francisco sewerage commission, 1892-93; city engineer, San Francisco, 1900–04; member of isthmian canal commission, 1904-05; consulting engineer, United States reclamation service, 1905–07; consulting engineer, New York and San Francisco, since 1907. Member of American society of civil engineers, etc.

Guarini (gwä-rē'-nē), Giovanni Battista, Italian poet and diplomat, was born at Ferrara, 1537. He was intrusted by Duke Alfonso II. with diplomatic missions to the pope, the emperor, Venice, and Poland. His chief work was the famous pastoral play, Il Pastor Fido, really an imitation of Tasso's Aminta. Died, 1612.

Guericke (gā'-rĭ-kē), Otto von, German physicist, was born at Magdeburg, in Prussian Saxony, 1602. He studied at Leipzig, Jena, and Leyden, and traveled in France and England. As a physicist he is chiefly known by his discoveries relative to nature and effects of air. The experiments of Galileo and Pascal on the weight of air led Guericke to attempt the creation of a vacuum. This resulted in the first air-pump, invented about 1650. Guericke's invention soon became famous, and in 1654 he was summoned to the presence of the emperor Ferdinand III. of Germany at Ratisbon, at which time he made the famous experiment commonly known as the "Magdeburg hemispheres," in demonstration of atmospheric pressure. Died, 1686.

Guesclin (gĕ'-klăɴ'), Bertrand, French general and the most famous French soldier of the age, was born in 1320. He gained his first reputation as a soldier in 1338 at a tournament to celebrate the marriage of Charles de Blois with Jeanne de Penthièvre, at which he unseated all the famous competitors. Becoming a soldier of fortune under Charles, he gained great distinction at the siege of Vannes, 1342. He was knighted, and in 1351 went, with the lords of Brittany, to England to secure the release of his captive master. He gallantly relieved Rennes, besieged by the duke of Lancaster in 1356, and by his help the city held out until the truce of Bordeaux, 1357. He soon took service under the French king, and, after several brilliant actions, was made marshal of Normandy and count of Longueville. At the battle of Auray, 1364, he was taken prisoner, but was ransomed for a large sum of money, and led his soldiers into Spain. He was afterward taken prisoner by the Black Prince, then in alliance with Pedro "the cruel." Being again ransomed, he restored Henry to the throne in 1369. In 1370 he was made constable of France, and for ten years was active and successful in driving the English from the south and west of France. In 1373 he seized and held most of the strongholds in the duchy of Brittany. He died, 1380.

Guggenheim, Simon, capitalist, ex-United States senator, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., 1867. He was graduated from public schools of Philadelphia, after which he studied languages in Europe two years. Went to Pueblo, Col., 1888, and engaged extensively in mining and smelting in the United States and Mexico. He was elected United States senator from Colorado to succeed Thomas M. Patterson, and took his seat, 1907. His term expired in 1913.

Guido Reni (gwē'-dō rā'-nē), Italian painter of the eclectic (Bolognese) school, was born near Bologna, 1575. He studied under Calvaert, but subsequently followed the more refined and ideal school of the Caracci, previous to finally striking out a style for himself. In 1608 he went to Rome where he remained for twenty years, and was a rival of Caravaggio. Among his best productions are "The Crucifixion of St. Peter," a magnificent work in the vatican museum; and the famous portrait of Beatrice Cenci, one of the most interesting paintings in Rome. The "Aurora" of Guido, on the ceiling of one of the halls of the Rospigliosi palace, is a fresco of world-wide fame, and is considered the greatest of his works. He died in 1642.

Guild, Curtis, journalist, ambassador to Russia since 1911; was born at Boston, 1860. He was graduated at Harvard, 1881. After graduation he made tour of Europe; entered office of Commercial Bulletin, Boston, founded by his father; served from bill collector to editor, and, since 1902, sole owner of the paper. He was brigadier-general of state militia at outbreak of Spanish war; served as lieutenant-colonel, inspector-general on staff, 7th corps (General Fitzhugh Lee) until break-up of corps in Cuba; lieutenant-governor of Massachusetts, 1902–05; governor of Massachusetts, 1906–09.

Guiscard (gēs'-kär'), Robert, Norman soldier, and son of Tancred d'Hauteville, was born in 1015. He defeated Leo IX. at Civitella, and, upon the death of his brother, Humphrey, became count of Apulia. Subsequently he rescued Gregory VII. from the emperor Henry IV., invaded the Greek empire, and died, 1085, when on another expedition against it, having defeated the fleets of the eastern empire and Venice.

Guise (gü-ēz'), a ducal family of Lorraine, was so named from the town of Guise. The most prominent members historically are the following:

Claude of Lorraine (1496–1550), fifth son of René II., duke of Lorraine, was born at the château of Condé, fought at Marignano in 1515, but after that campaign remained at home to defend France against the English and Germans. For suppressing the peasant revolt in Lorraine, 1527, Francis created him duke of Guise.

Mary of Lorraine (1515–60), his daughter, in 1534 married Louis of Orleans, duke of Longueville, and in 1538 James V. of Scotland, at whose death, in 1542, she was left with one child, Mary, queen of Scots. During the troublous years that followed, the queen-mother acted with wisdom and moderation; but after her accession to the regency in 1554 she allowed the Guises so much influence that the Protestant nobles raised a rebellion, which continued to her death in Edinburgh castle.

Francis (1519–63), her brother, second duke, became one of the greatest generals of France. Having in 1552-53 held Metz against Charles V. of Germany, he added to his reputation at Renti, in 1554, and in 1556 commanded the expedition against Naples. Recalled in 1557 to defend the northern frontier against the English, he took Calais, 1558, and other towns, and brought about the treaty of Cateau Cambrésis, 1559. He and his brother Charles, the cardinal, afterward conspicuous at the council of Trent, managed to become all-powerful during the reign of Francis II. Heading the Roman Catholic party, they sternly repressed Protestantism. Guise and Montmorency won a victory over the Huguenots at Dreux, 1562, and Guise was besieging Orleans when he was assassinated by a Huguenot.

Henry I. (1550–88), third duke, fought fiercely against the Protestants at Jarnac and Moncontour, 1569, and forced Coligny to raise the siege of Poitiers. He was one of the contrivers of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, 1572, and was the head of the Catholic league. He was, however, ambitious to succeed to the throne of France, when Henry III. procured his assassination at Blois.

Henry II. (1614–64), his grandson, fifth duke, at fifteen became archbishop of Rheims, but in 1640 succeeded to the dukedom. Having joined the league against Richelieu, he was condemned to death, but fled to Flanders. He put himself at the head of Masaniello's revolt in Naples as the representative of the Anjou family, but was taken by the Spanish, 1647, and carried to Madrid, where he remained five years. After another attempt to win Naples, 1654, he settled at Paris.

Guiteras, Juan, physician, professor of general pathology and tropical diseases, university of Havana, since 1900; director public health of Cuba since 1909; was born at Matanzas, Cuba, 1852. He was educated at La Empresa, Matanzas; M. D., university of Pennsylvania, 1873; Ph. D. He was in United States marine hospital service, 1879–89; served as expert in yellow fever in all epidemics since 1881; was professor of pathology, university of Pennsylvania; on staff of General Shafter as yellow fever expert in Santiago campaign, 1898. Editor of La Revista de Medicina Tropical, and member of many medical and scientific associations.

Guizot (gē'-zō'), François Pierre Guillaume, French statesman and historian, was born at Nimes, France, 1787. In 1805 he went to Paris, studied law, became a professor at the Sorbonne in 1812, and devoted himself to literature. His first work, the Nouveau Dictionnaire Universel des Synonymes de la Langue Française, appeared in 1809. After the second restoration he became general secretary to the minister of the interior, afterward to the minister of justice. He contributed to the dissolution of the Chambre Introuvable by writing a memorial which was placed in the hands of Louis XVIII. by Decazes. The latter committed to him the direction of the administration of the communes and departments in 1819. After the revolution of 1830, he became successively minister of public instruction and minister of the interior, an office which he held, with two interruptions, until 1836. On the breaking out of the eastern disturbances in the beginning of 1840, under Soult's administration, he was sent as ambassador to London; in 1847 he became the official leader of the cabinet, which maintained its ground, as the organ of Louis Philippe's policy, until the revolution of 1848. Among his works are his History of the English Revolution, Life of Oliver Cromwell, History of Civilization in Europe, and History of Civilization in France. He died in 1874.

Gunsaulus (gŭn-sô'-lŭs), Frank Wakeley, Congregational clergyman, educator, was born at Chesterville, Ohio, 1856. He was graduated at Ohio Wesleyan university, 1875; D. D., Beloit college, Wisconsin. Ordained Methodist minister; pastor of Eastwood Congregational church, Columbus, Ohio, 1879–81; Newtonville, Mass., 1881–85; pastor of Memorial Congregational church, Baltimore, 1885–87; Plymouth church, Chicago, 1887–99; Central church, Chicago, since 1899; president of Armour institute of technology, since 1893; lecturer of Yale theological seminary, 1882; professorial lecturer of university of Chicago. Author: Phidias and Other Poems; Songs of Night and Day; Transfiguration of Christ; Monk and Knight; Life of William Ewart Gladstone; Metamorphosis of a Creed; November at Eastwood; Loose Leaves of Song; The Man of Galilee; Paths to Power; Paths to the City of God; Higher Ministries of Recent English Poetry, etc.

Gunter (gŭn'-tẽr), Edmund, English mathematician, was born in Hertfordshire about 1581. He was educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford; obtained a Southwark curacy in 1615, and in 1619 became professor of astronomy in Gresham college, London. He invented the sector, with the lines known as Gunter's scale. His principal works are Canon Triangulorum, a table of logarithmic sines, etc.; On the Sector, Cross-staff, and Other Instruments. Invented the surveying-chain, and made first observation of the variation of the compass. Died, 1626.

Günther (gün'-tẽr), Albert Charles Lewis Gotthilf, German-English zoölogist, was born at Esslingen, Württemberg, 1830, and educated at the universities of Tübingen, Berlin, and Bonn. He entered the British museum in 1856, and was appointed keeper of the department of zoölogy in 1875. Subsequently he devoted himself exclusively to the administration of the extensive collections under his charge. He published Die Fische des Neckars; Medizinische Zoölogie; The Reptiles of British India; Catalogue of Fishes; The Fishes of the South Seas; The Gigantic Land Tortoises, Living and Extinct; An Introduction to the Study of Fishes; and numerous papers in the philosophical transactions, the proceedings of the zoölogical and Linnean societies, and other periodicals. He founded the Record of Zoölogical Literature, of which he edited the first six volumes, and was co-editor of the Annals and Magazine of Natural History.

Gustavus Vasa (gŭs-tā′-vŭs vä′-sȧ), king of Sweden, was born of a noble house at Lindholmen in Upland, 1496, and in 1518, during the patriotic struggle with Christian II. of Denmark, was treacherously carried off to Denmark as a hostage. After a year he escaped to Lübeck, thence to Sweden, where he strove in vain to rouse a spirit of resistance against the Danes. Retreating to Dalecarlia, he wandered for months with a price set on his head, and worked on farms and in mines. At last the infamous "blood-bath" of Stockholm, 1520, roused the Swedes, and soon Gustavus had an army large enough to attack the enemy. His capture of Stockholm in 1523 drove the Danes from Sweden. Thus ended the great Scandinavian union which had existed for 126 years, and Gustavus I. was elected king. He found the whole country demoralized. Yet after a forty years' rule he left Sweden a peaceful and civilized realm, with a full exchequer and a well-organized army. He promoted trade, fostered schools, and made roads, bridges, and canals. Missions were sent to the Lapps, and a Finnish Bible was printed for the Finns. He died in 1560, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Eric.

Gustavus II., Adolphus, was born at Stockholm, 1594. He was the grandson of Gustavus Vasa by his youngest son, Charles IX., at whose death, in 1611, he succeeded to the throne of Sweden. Gustavus had been strictly brought up in the Lutheran faith, carefully trained in habits of business, and was one of the most accomplished princes of his age. He was acquainted with eight languages, five of which he spoke and wrote fluently, was well read in the classics and ancient history. He was proficient in music, and excelled in all warlike and manly exercises. Having made various administrative reforms, and availed himself of the short interval of peace to promote the material prosperity of the country, he remitted the charge of the government to his chancellor, Oxenstiern, and set sail, in the summer of 1630, with an army of about 15,000 men, to aid the Protestants of Germany in their hard struggle against the Catholic league, which was backed by the power of the empire. With and for the Germans he fought until his death on the battlefield of Lützen, 1632. He made Sweden a power in northern Europe.

Gustavus III., king of Sweden, was born at Stockholm, 1746, and succeeded his father, Adolphus Frederick, in 1771. At this period the country was distracted by the intrigues of the rival political parties of Horn and Gyllenborg, known as the "hats" and "caps." A revolution was effected without the shedding of blood, and by a stroke of the pen Gustavus recovered all the legal powers that had been gradually lost by his immediate predecessors. In 1792 he was mortally wounded by Ankarström at a masked ball in the opera house which he himself had built. The pistol had been loaded with broken shot, which rendered the wound especially painful, and the king suffered the most dreadful agony for thirteen days before his death. Gustavus was a man of varied learning, and the author of several dramatic works and poems of considerable merit.

Gustavus V., king of Sweden, was born in 1858, and married, in 1881, Princess Victoria of Baden, first cousin of the German emperor and a descendant of the old Swedish royal family of Vasa. He succeeded his father, King Oscar II., on December 8, 1907, having several times previously acted as regent. The king's eldest son, Prince Gustavus Adolphus, married Princess Margaret of Connaught, June, 1905. His majesty is a knight of the garter of Great Britain, and received the royal Victorian chain in April, 1908.

Gutenberg (gōō′-ten-bĕrk), Johann. See page 324.

Gutzkow (gōōts′-kō), Karl Ferdinand, German dramatist and author, was born in 1811. He was educated at the Friedrichswerder gymnasium, studied philosophy and theology at the university of Berlin; became leader of the Young German party in 1830; started a newspaper in 1831; went to Stuttgart to assist in editing Menzel's Literaturblatt; continued his studies in the universities of Jena, Heidelberg, and Munich; engaged in journalism in Frankfort; was imprisoned three months and had all his writings suppressed for the atheistic and socialistic views expressed in his novel, Wally, die Zweiflerin, 1835, and in the same year elaborated his opinions in Nero, a dramatic work. To escape the surveillance of the Prussian government he went to Hamburg in 1837, thence to various German cities, and in 1870 made his permanent residence in Berlin. He was author of numerous comedies, tragedies, dramas, and novels, which attained wide popularity. Died, 1878.

Guyon (güē′-yôɴ′), Jeanne Marie Bouvier de la Motte, French mystic, was born at Montargis, 1648. She was married at sixteen to Jacques Guyon, and, left a widow at twenty-eight, determined to devote her life to the poor and needy, and to the cultivation of spiritual perfection. The former part of her plan she began to carry out in 1681 at Geneva, but three years later she was compelled to depart on the ground that her doctrines were heretical. At Turin, Grenoble, Nice, Genoa, Vercelli, and Paris, where she finally settled in 1686, she became the center of a movement for the promotion of "holy living." In 1688 she was arrested for heretical opinions, and for having been in correspondence with Molinos, the leader of the movement in Spain; and out of a commission appointed to inquire into her teachings arose a controversy between Fénelon and Bossuet. Released by the intervention of Madame de Maintenon, after a detention of nine months, but again imprisoned in 1695, she was not released from the Bastille until 1702. She died at Blois in 1717. She wrote Les Torrens Spirituels, Moyen Court de Faire Oraison, a mystical interpretation of the song of Solomon, an autobiography, letters, and some spiritual poetry.

Guyot (gē′-yō), Arnold Henry, Swiss geographer and geologist, was born at Neuchâtel, 1807. He came to America in 1848, and devoted his life to science; was professor of geology and physical geography at Princeton college, 1855–84. He formed an intimacy with Agassiz, and made numerous maps, mathematical tables and textbooks. His greatest works were The Meteorological and Physical Tables, issued by the Smithsonian institution, and his Earth and Man. Died, 1884.

Haakon VII. (hô′-kōn), king of Norway, was born in 1872, and is the second son of King Frederik of Denmark, and a nephew of Queen Alexandra of Great Britain. His baptismal name was Charles, but he assumed the above title on becoming king November 18, 1905, on the separation of Norway and Sweden. King Haakon and Queen Maud made their formal entry into Christiania November 25, 1905, and the king took the oath before the Storthing on the 27th, and was crowned at Trondhjem on June 22, 1906. The king married Princess Maud Alexandra, daughter of King Edward VII., July 22, 1896. His son and heir-apparent is Prince Alexander, born July 2, 1903, and renamed Prince Olaf on his father's accession to the throne. The king is a knight of the garter and honorary admiral in the British fleet.

Hackett, Horatio Balch, American biblical scholar, was born in Salisbury, Mass., 1808. He was graduated at Amherst in 1830, studied in Germany, became a tutor at Amherst, professor of ancient languages at Brown university, and in 1839 professor of biblical literature in Newton theological institute. In 1870 he became professor of Greek in Rochester theological seminary, and died in 1875. He was one of the American revisers of the Bible, and was the author of a Hebrew Grammar; Commentary on the Acts; Illustrations of Scripture; and was co-editor of Smith's Bible Dictionary.

Hackett, James Keteltas, actor, was born at Wolfe Island, Ont., 1869. He was graduated at the college of the city of New York, 1891, and studied at New York law school. Made his début on stage in Palmer's stock company, 1892; was leading man at New York Lyceum at twenty-six. His most notable successes were Prisoner of Zenda, and its sequel, Rupert of Hentzau, and The Pride of Jennico, under the management of Daniel Frohman. He is now one of the few actor-managers in America.

Hading (ȧ'-dăɴ'), Jane, stage name of Jeanne-Alfrédine Tréfouret, French actress, was born at Marseilles, France, 1859. At the age of three she played Blanche de Caylus in Le Bossu, her father at the same time playing the leading character. Some years later she was sent to the Marseilles conservatoiré, where she won considerable distinction. On leaving she entered upon an engagement at the Algiers theater, and when but fourteen played Zouella in Le Passant, Stefano in Chef d'œuvre in Connu, the blind girl in Les Deux Orphilines, and Pedro in Giroflé-Girofla. From Algiers she went to Cairo to perform at the Khedival theater. She returned to Marseilles in 1876, and for a time devoted herself to drama and comedy; but the lyric stage again attracted her, and she went to Paris. At the Palais Royal she played La Chaste Susanna, and at the Renaissance she was the original Jolie Persane and Belle Lurette, and the heroine in Hélôise and Abelard. She again appeared in comedy as Paulette in Antour de Mariage, and as Claire de Beaulieu in La Maître de Forges. She subsequently appeared in London at the Royalty theater, and in 1888 and 1894 made successful tours of the United States, accompanied by M. Coquelin. One of her latest successes was in The Second Mrs. Tanqueray.

Hadley, Arthur Twining, American educator and economist, president of Yale university since 1899, was born in New Haven, Conn., 1856. He was graduated at Yale, 1876; was a student of university of Berlin; LL. D., Harvard, 1899; Columbia, 1900; Johns Hopkins, 1902. Tutor, 1879–83, lecturer, 1883–86, Yale; commissioner of labor statistics, Connecticut, 1885–87; professor of political science, 1886–91, political economy, 1891-99, Yale; president of American economic association, 1899, 1900. Author: Railroad Transportation: Its History and Laws; Connecticut Labor Reports, 1885-86; Economics: An Account of the Relations Between Private Property and Public Welfare; The Education of the American Citizen; Freedom and Responsibility; Baccalaureate Addresses; Standards of Public Morality, etc. He was American editor of the tenth edition of Encyclopedia Britannica.

Hadley, James, father of preceding, American classical scholar and writer, was born in Fairfield, N. Y., 1821. He was graduated at Yale college in 1842, became tutor in mathematics at Middlebury college, and in 1845 tutor of classical history at Yale. In 1848 he was appointed assistant professor, and in 1851 succeeded Theodore D. Woolsey as professor of Greek, which position he held until his death in 1872. He was a distinguished student of philology and civil law, was one of the American committee for the revision of the new testament, and a member of a number of learned societies. He was the author of a Greek Grammar; Introduction to Roman Law; Brief History of the English Language; Essays, etc.

Hadrian, or Publius Ælius Hadrianus, Roman emperor from 117 to 138, was born in 76 A. D. He was elected by the army successor of Trajan. His reign was one of the happiest periods in Roman history, the only important war which broke out during the reign being a rebellion of the Jews which lasted for three years. He erected many magnificent works in various parts of his empire, the remains of some of which are still standing. During his last years he was morose and cruel; though some verses, addressed to his soul, which he is said to have composed on his death-bed, are of quite a different character. They were imitated by Pope in his poem, The Dying Christian to His Soul. After his death, which took place at Balæ, 138 A. D., he was succeeded by Antoninus Pius. The mausoleum which he built for himself in Rome forms the groundwork of the present castle of St. Angelo.

Haeckel (hĕk'-el), Ernst Heinrich, German naturalist and writer, was born at Potsdam, Prussia, 1834. He studied medicine and science at Würzburg, Berlin, and Vienna. In 1859 he went to Italy, and studied zoölogy at Naples and Messini, returning in 1861 to Jena, where he was appointed professor of zoölogy. Between 1866 and 1875 he traveled over the greater part of Europe, besides visiting Syria and Egypt. Later he visited India and Ceylon, and published a lively account of his travels. He is regarded in Germany as the foremost supporter of Darwin's theories. Among his works are The History of Creation; The Origin of the Human Race; Life in the Deep Seas; The History of Man's Development; Popular Lectures on Evolution; Voyage of H. M. S. Challenger, etc.

Hafiz (hä'-fĭz or hä-fēz'), Mohammed Shamsuddin, or Shams-ed-Din, better known by his poetical name of Hafiz, was the greatest of Persian lyrical poets. He was also eminent as a teacher of theology and mystic philosophy, but it was his poetic genius which gained for him a world-wide fame. The name of Hafiz is a household word throughout Persia, and his songs are recited in every social assembly, so that he, who can most frequently garnish his conversation with quotations from Hafiz, is held in the highest esteem and admiration. The date of his birth is unknown, but he is said to have died at a good old age in 1388 A. D.

Haggard, Henry Rider, English novelist, barrister, and social reformer, was born in England, 1856. He accompanied Sir Henry Bulwer, as secretary, to Natal in 1875, and formally hoisted the British flag over Transvaal territory, 1877. He was subsequently appointed to the post of master of the high court of the Transvaal. During the Zulu war he was elected adjutant and lieutenant of the Pretoria horse. He retired from the colonial service in 1879; returned to England and became a barrister. His first book, published in 1882, of a political character, is named Cetywayo and His White Neighbors; or Remarks on Recent Events in South Africa. Subsequently he published Dawn; The Witch's Head, and King Solomon's Mines, the work by which he established his reputation; She, a novel of great power; Ayesha, or the Return of She; Jess; Cleopatra; Beatrice; Eric Brighteyes, etc. He has also written Rural England and A Farmer's Year, and has made extensive studies in socialistic settlements.

Hague (hāg), Arnold, American geologist, was born in Boston, Mass., 1840. He was graduated at the scientific school of Yale, 1863, and for several years studied in Germany at Göttingen, Heidelberg, and in the mining school at Freiberg. D. Sc., Columbia, 1901; LL. D., Aberdeen, 1906. He was assistant geologist of United States geological exploration of 40th parallel, 1867–77; geologist in the service of the Chinese government, 1878-79; field service in Rocky mountains and for several years in Yellowstone national park and adjacent country; secretary, national academy of sciences, since 1901, and member of many scientific societies. Author: Descriptive Geology; Geological Exploration of 40th Parallel; Geology of the Eureka District; Geology, Yellowstone National Park; Tertiary Volcanoes of the Absaroka Range; Geological Atlas of Yellowstone Park, etc.

Hahnemann (hä'-nĕ-män), Samuel Christian Friedrich, physician, founder of the homeopathic system of medicine, was born at Meissen, Saxony, in 1755. He received the degree of M. D. at Erlangen in 1779. While translating Cullen's Materia Medica from English into German, 1790, he noticed a similarity between the effects of Peruvian bark — cinchona — upon a healthy person and the results of certain diseases for the cure of which that drug was used. In other words, he rediscovered, quite independently, Hippocrates' old "law of similars." After many experiments he became convinced of the truth of the principle similia similibus curantur — that is, the cure for a disease is the very drug that would in a healthy individual produce the symptoms of such disease. Further investigation caused him to conclude that the conventional doses of his day were injurious, and this led him to another principle, that of very minute doses, made by a process of "potentization," described by him at length in his Organon, 1810, which work was translated into many languages. He encountered much opposition, and, after having practiced medicine at Leipzig for more than thirty years, was driven out of that city, 1821, by the apothecaries who invoked the aid of the German law which prohibited physicians from dispensing their own prescriptions. The grand duke of Anhalt, however, appointed him court physician, and he remained at Köthen, occupying that position until 1835, when he removed to Paris. Although opinions differ very widely concerning the accuracy and scientific value of Hahnemann's investigations, it is undeniable that he was a man of great courage and perseverance. He not only sacrificed his financial interests for the sake of his convictions, but he made many painful experiments upon his own person. He died in 1843.

Hakluyt (hăk'-lōōt), Richard, English author, was born about 1552. He was lecturer on cosmography at Oxford university, and was the first to teach the use of globes. He was afterward professor of divinity, and in 1584–89 was in Paris, where he published several works. On his return he joined Raleigh's company of gentlemen adventurers and merchants for colonizing Virginia. His chief work is The principal Navigations, Voyages, and Discoveries of the English Nation, commonly called Hakluyt's Voyages. Died, 1616.

Haldane (hăl'-dān), Richard Burdon, British statesman and writer, was born in 1856. He was educated at Edinburgh academy and university and at Göttingen; in 1879 was called to the chancery bar, and in 1890 was made a queen's counsel; hon. D. C. L., Oxford; LL. D., Edinburgh. He entered parliament in 1885 as member for Haddingtonshire, and became British secretary of state for war in 1905. He translated Schopenhauer (with Kemp, 1883–86), and wrote a Life of Adam Smith, 1887; and his Gifford lectures at St. Andrews on the fundamental problems of philosophy and theology were published as The Pathway to Reality, 1903. In Education and Empire, 1902, he zealously insisted on educational reform as essential to national well-being. He also wrote Essays in Philosophical Criticism, etc.

Haldeman (hŏl'-dĕ-man), Samuel Stehman, American naturalist and philologist, was born near Columbia, Pa., 1812. He was assistant on the New Jersey geological survey, 1836, and in the Pennsylvania geological survey, 1837. While engaged thus he found the oldest fossil known at the time, viz., Scolithus linearis. He occupied the chair of natural history, and later of comparative philology, in the university of Pennsylvania, and was the author of numerous articles on philology, conchology, entomology, and palaeontology. His work, Analytic Orthography, obtained in England the highest Trevelyan prize over eighteen competitors, 1858. He died in 1880.

Hale, Edward Everett, Unitarian clergyman, author, was born in Boston, Mass., 1822. He was graduated at Harvard university, 1839; S. T. D., 1879; LL. D., Dartmouth, 1901, Williams, 1904. Studied theology, and became minister of the church of the Unity, Worcester, Mass., 1846–56; minister of South Congregational (Unitarian) church, Boston, Mass., 1856–1909; chaplain United States senate, 1902–09. He actively promoted the Chautauqua movement, assisted in the organization of "Lend-a-Hand" clubs, and was a prolific editor and writer. Author: (stories) The Man Without a Country; Ten Times One is Ten; In His Name; Mr. Tangier's Vacations; His Level Best; The Ingham Papers; Ups and Downs; Philip Nolan's Friends; Fortunes of Rachel; Four and Five; Crusoe in New York; Christmas Eve and Christmas Day; Christmas in Narragansett; Our Christmas in a Palace, etc. Also: Sketches in Christian History; What Career? Boy's Heroes; The Story of Massachusetts; Sybaris and Other Homes; For Fifty Years; A New England Boyhood; If Jesus Came to Boston; Memories of a Hundred Years; Ralph Waldo Emerson; We, the People; New England Ballads; Prayers in the United States Senate; Foundation of the Republic, etc. Died, 1909.

Hale, Eugene, United States senator from Maine, 1881–1911, was born in Turner, Oxford county, Me., 1836. He received an academic education; LL. D., Bates college, Colby university and Bowdoin college; was admitted to the bar, 1857; county attorney of Hancock county for nine years; member of Maine legislature, 1867, 1868, and 1880; member of congress, 1869–79. Was appointed postmaster-general by President Grant, 1874, but declined; was tendered naval portfolio by President Hayes, but declined; delegate to national republican conventions, 1868, 1876, and 1880. He was elected to the United States senate to succeed Hannibal Hamlin in 1881, and became the republican floor leader of the senate, from which he retired in 1911.

Hale, George Ellery, American astronomer, was born at Chicago, Ill., 1868. He was graduated at Massachusetts institute of technology; studied at Harvard college observatory, 1889-90, university of Berlin, 1893-94; Sc. D., Western university of Pennsylvania, 1897, Yale, 1905; LL. D., Beloit, 1904. Wilson, Cal. Joint editor Astronomy and Astrophysics; editor Astrophysical Journal since 1895. He has written many papers on the sun, stellar spectroscopy, etc.

Hale, John Parker, American statesman, was born at Rochester, N. H., 1806. He was graduated at Bowdoin college, and admitted to the bar, 1830; was elected to congress in 1842 as a democrat, but opposed the annexation of Texas. He served in the United States senate, 1847–53 and 1855–65, and was an unsuccessful candidate for the presidency, 1852. Was minister to Spain, 1865–69. Died at Dover, N. H., 1873.

Hale, Sir Matthew, English lawyer and jurist, was born at Alderley, England, 1609. He was graduated at Oxford, studied law at Lincoln's Inn, and was admitted to the bar in 1637. Though a royalist, he was appointed head of the committee for prevention of delays and expenses of law in 1652; became a judge of common pleas in 1654, and sat in parliament until the restoration, when he was made lord chief baron of the exchequer. In 1671 he became lord chief justice, and resigned shortly before his death. He wrote a History of the Pleas of the Crown, Difficiles Nugæ, an essay on Gravitation of Fluids, History of the Common Law of England, and Contemplations, Moral and Divine. Died, 1676.

Hale, Nathan, American patriot, was born in Coventry, Conn., 1755. He was graduated at Yale college in 1773, and devoted himself to the cause of the colonies in the contest with Great Britain. After the defeat of the patriot army at Long Island he endeavored to obtain knowledge of the enemy's plans and position for the information of Washington. He obtained the knowledge, but was arrested by the British before he could return, and, the papers containing the information being found on his person, he was hanged as a spy, by order of Sir William Howe, 1776. His sentence was carried into effect in the most unfeeling manner; he was refused the attendance of a clergyman, and the letters which he wrote to his mother a short time before his death were destroyed. His last words were, "I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country."

Hale, Sarah Josepha, American writer, author of Mary's Lamb, was born at Newport, N. H., 1790. On her husband's death in 1822 she devoted herself to authorship, and became in 1828 editor of the Ladies' Magazine. She helped to procure the employment of lady medical missionaries. to complete the Bunker Hill monument, and suggested the observance of Thanksgiving day in all the states. Her works include poems, novels, biography, etc. Died, 1879.

Halévy (ȧ'-lā-'vē'), Jacques François Fromental, French composer, was born at Paris, of Jewish parentage, 1799. He studied under Berton and Cherubini, and afterward at Rome. The first work that brought him any considerable reputation was La Juive, produced at the Grand Opéra in 1835. The most important of his subsequent pieces were: La Reine de Chypre, Charles VI., Le Juif Errant, and La Magicienne. Those executed for the Opéra Comique are regarded as his most successful; the principal are: Les Mousquetaires, L'Éclair, and Le Val d'Andorre. He was a great favorite with his countrymen, but his style was so purely national that, in spite of his great dramatic power, he did not enjoy a great celebrity out of France until recently. He died in 1862.

Halévy, Ludovic, French novelist and dramatic author, was born at Paris, 1834, and received his education at the Lycée Louis le Grand. He entered the service of the government, and from 1852 to 1858 was employed in the office of the minister of state. He was chief of the department for Algiers and the colonies, and in 1861 was appointed to edit the proceedings of the corps législatif. This position he resigned to devote himself to the drama. He was the librettist of many of Offenbach's operettas. Under his own name, and with various collaborators, principally M. M. L. Battu, Hector Crimieux, and Henri Meilhac, he produced Ba-La-Clan; Rose et Rosette; Orphée aux Enfers; La Belle Hélène, a burlesque of ancient Greek life, which had a great success; La Barbe Bleue; La Grande Duchesse de Gérolstein; Froufrou; L'Édé de la Saint Martin; La Boulangere a des écus; Le Maride la Débutante; L'Abbé Constantin; Karikari, etc. In 1872 he published L'Invasion, personal recollections of the war; and in 1873, Madame et Monsieur Cardinal. He was a member of the French academy. Died, 1908.

Haliburton (hăl'-ĭ-bûr'-t'n), Thomas Chandler, Canadian humorist, was born at Windsor, Nova Scotia, 1796. He was judge of the supreme court of Nova Scotia, but is best known as a satirical writer. In 1837 he published The Clockmaker; or the Sayings and Doings of Samuel Slick of Slickville, which became very popular. He was also the author of The Attaché, or Sam Slick in England, which was the result of a visit to that country in 1841. In 1856 he went to England to reside permanently, and in 1859 entered the house of commons as member for Launceston, which seat he held until within a few months of his death. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote: The Old Judge, or Life in a Colony; The Letter Bag of the Great Western; Traits of American Humor, and several other books. He died at Isleworth, Middlesex, England, 1865.

Halifax, Charles Montagu, Earl of, British poet and statesman, was born at Horton, England, 1661. He was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. His most notable poetical achievement was a parody on Dryden's Hind and Panther, entitled The Town and Country Mouse, 1687, of which he was joint-author with Matthew Prior. He was member of parliament for Maldon in 1689, and a lord of the treasury in 1692, and in that year proposed to raise a million sterling by way of loan — so the national debt was established. In 1694 money was again wanted, and Montagu supplied it by originating the bank of England, as proposed by William Paterson three years earlier. For this service Montagu was appointed chancellor of the exchequer. His next work was the recoinage in 1695, appointing his friend, Newton, warden of the mint, and raising a tax on windows to pay the expense; and now he first introduced exchequer bills. In 1697 he became premier, but his arrogance and vanity soon made him unpopular, and he was impeached in 1701, but was protected by the lords and the proceedings fell to the ground. He was president of the royal society, 1695–98. Died, 1715.

Hall, Charles Cuthbert, American theologian, was born in New York city, 1852; graduated at Williams college, 1872; D. D., university of New York, 1890, Harvard, 1897, Yale, 1901; LL. D., Union, 1905. Studied theology at Union theological seminary and in London and Edinburgh. Pastor of Union Presbyterian church, Newburgh,

N. Y., 1875–77; First Presbyterian church, Brooklyn, 1887–97. Barrows lecturer for the university of Chicago to the far East, 1902-03 and 1906-07; Cole lecturer, Vanderbilt university, 1905; Noble lecturer at Harvard, 1906. As president of Union theological seminary from 1897 until his death, he did much to encourage higher criticism, and to induce a more liberal and broadminded attitude on the part of the clergy. Author: Christian Belief Interpreted by Christian Experience; Redeemed Life After Death; Universal Elements of the Christian Religion; Christ and the Human Race; The Witness of Oriental Consciousness to Jesus Christ. Died, 1908.

Hall, Charles Martin, inventor, manufacturer, was born at Thompson, Ohio, 1863; graduated at Oberlin college, 1885, A. M., 1893. Invented the electrolytic process for the manufacture of aluminum now universally used, 1886; commenced its commercial manufacture in 1888 with Pittsburgh reduction company, now the Aluminum company of America. The Hall process has reduced the price of aluminum so as to make it a common metal of commerce, whereas it was formerly as costly as silver and little used. Member of many scientific societies; trustee of Oberlin college.

Hall, Granville Stanley, American educator and psychologist, president of Clark university since 1888, was born in Ashfield, Mass., 1846. He was graduated at Williams college, 1867; Ph. D., Harvard, 1878; LL. D., university of Michigan, 1888, Johns Hopkins, 1902; was professor of psychology, Antioch, Ohio, college, 1872–76; studied in Berlin, Bonn, Heidelberg, and Leipzig; lecturer on psychology in Harvard and Williams, 1880-81; professor of psychology, Johns Hopkins, 1881–88. Author: Aspects of German Culture; Hints Toward a Select and Descriptive Bibliography of Education (with John M. Mansfield); Adolescence (2 vols.); Youth — Its Education, Regimen, and Hygiene, etc. Editor and founder of The American Journal of Psychology; editor The Pedagogical Seminary, and American Journal of Religious Psychology and Education.

Hall, Marshall, British physician and physiologist, was born at Basford, Notts, 1790. After studying at Edinburgh, Paris, Göttingen, and Berlin, he settled at Nottingham in 1815, and practiced in London from 1826 until 1853. He did important work in regard to the reflex action of the spinal system, and his name is also associated with a standard method of restoring suspended respiration. He wrote on diagnosis, the circulation, and finally an important article on Respiration and Irritability. Died, 1857.

Hall, Robert, British pulpit orator, was born at Arnsby near Leicester, England, 1764. He was educated at a Baptist academy at Bristol, and at Aberdeen university. He was appointed assistant minister and tutor in the Bristol academy, where his eloquent preaching attracted overflowing audiences. He went in 1790 to Cambridge, where he rose to the highest rank of British pulpit orators. In 1807 he settled in Leicester, but returned in 1826 to Bristol. He died in 1831. Among his writings are Apology for the Freedom of the Press and On Terms of Communion.

Hallam, Henry, English historian and critic, was born at Windsor, England, 1777. He was graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, 1799, and subsequently called to the bar. LL. D., D. C. L., Cambridge and Oxford respectively. His first writings were published in periodicals, especially the Edinburgh Review; afterward he was distinguished among the literary men of Europe for his extensive and profound learning, powers of generalization, taste, judgment, and conscientiousness, exhibited in a succession of great works, the principal of which are Europe During the Middle Ages, The Constitutional History of England, and Introduction to the Literature of Europe. During the greater portion of his long life he lived in London in privacy, devoting himself to linguistic and historical studies. Died, 1859.

Halleck, Fitz-Greene, American poet, was born in Guilford, Conn., 1790. He began life as a clerk in a store in Guilford, but when twenty-one years old he was employed in a banking-house in New York, where he remained many years. At last he became a clerk for John Jacob Astor, who left him in his will $200 a year for the rest of his life. Halleck then retired from active life and passed the rest of his days at Guilford. His earliest poem, Twilight, was printed in 1818. Five years after he visited Europe, and in 1827 a volume of his poetry, including Marco Bozzaris, appeared. He died in Guilford, 1867. A bronze statue of him has been erected in Central park, New York.

Haller (häl'-ĕr), Albrecht von, Swiss anatomist, botanist, physiologist, and poet, was born at Bern, 1708. He started practice in 1729, but in 1736 was called to a chair at Göttingen. Here he organized a botanical garden, an anatomical museum and theater, and an obstetrical school; helped to found the academy of sciences; wrote anatomical and physiological works; and took an active part in the literary movement. In 1753 he resigned and returned to Bern, where he became magistrate. After this he wrote three political romances, and prepared four large works on the bibliography connected with botany, anatomy, surgery, and medicine. His poems were descriptive, didactic, and (the best of them) lyrical. Died, 1777.

Halley, Edmund, English astronomer, was born in 1656. He went to St. Helena in 1676 to study the southern heavens, and in 1679 published his Catalogus Stellarum Australium, containing the positions of 360 stars, and numerous other observations. In 1679 the royal society sent him to Dantzic to settle the controversy between Hooke and Hevelius. In 1681, near Paris, he discovered the comet known by his name; his prediction of its return was the first of the kind that proved correct. In 1683 he published his Theory of the Variation of the Magnetic Compass, and from an examination of Kepler's laws of the planetary motions inferred that the centripetal force always varies inversely as the square of the distance. He prevailed on Sir Isaac Newton to complete his Principia, the first volume of which was printed by Halley at his own expense. In 1692 he published his modified theory of the changes in the magnetic variation, and obtained from King William the appointment of captain of a vessel, in which in two successive voyages he finished his experiments. In 1703 he was chosen Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford. In 1721, after the death of Flamsteed, he was appointed astronomer royal; and he continued for twenty years, without an assistant, to carry on the operations of the Greenwich observatory. In 1721 he published his method of finding the longitude at sea, and in 1725 drew up his tables for computing the places of the planets, which did not appear until 1749. Died, 1742.

Halliwell-Phillipps (hăl'-ĭ-wĕl-fĭl'-ĭps), James Orchard, English Shakespearian scholar and antiquary, was born at Chelsea, 1820. He studied at Jesus college, Cambridge. His studies embraced the whole field of our earlier literature, and in 1839 he became fellow of the royal and antiquarian societies. Gradually he concentrated himself upon Shakespeare alone, and more particularly upon the facts of his life, the successive editions of his Outlines of the Life of Shakespeare recording the growing results of his discoveries. In 1872 he added to Halliwell the surname of Phillipps, that of his first wife, a Worcestershire heiress. He accumulated in his house, Hollingbury Copse, near Brighton, an unrivaled collection of Shakespearian books, MSS., and rarities, and gave princely benefactions to Edinburgh university, Stratford, and Birmingham. Besides his sumptuous folio edition of Shakespeare, he published Nursery Rhymes and Tales of England and Dictionary of Archaic and Provincial Words. Died, 1889.

Hals (hāls), Frans, the elder, portrait and genre painter, was born, probably at Antwerp, between 1580 and 1584. He settled in Haarlem about 1604, and is regarded as the founder of the Dutch school of genre-painting. His subjects of feasting and carousal are treated with marvelous vivacity and spirit. His works are distributed among the chief galleries of England and the continent. He died at Haarlem, 1666.

Hamerton (hăm′-ĕr-tun), Philip Gilbert, English writer on art, was born at Laneside, Oldham, the son of a solicitor at Shaw, 1834. He began as an art-critic by contributing to the Fine Arts Quarterly and Saturday Review, and published a volume of poems on The Isles of Loch Awe. Subsequently appeared A Painter's Camp in the Highlands; Etching and Etchers; Contemporary French Painters; and Painting in France after the Decline of Classicism. From 1869 he edited the Portfolio. The Intellectual Life, published in 1873, is a volume of letters of advice addressed to literary aspirants and others; Human Intercourse is a volume of essays on social subjects; The Graphic Arts, finely illustrated, is a treatise on drawing, painting, and engraving; Landscape, a superbly-illustrated volume, sets forth the influence of natural landscape on man. Among his other works are two lives of Turner, Portfolio Papers; French and English; Man in Art; The Mount; and two novels. He died at Boulogne-sur-Seine, 1894.

Hamilcar Barca (hă-mĭl′-kär bär′-kă), Carthaginian general, was born shortly before the first Punic war. While very young he was appointed to the command of the Carthaginian forces in Sicily in 247 B. C., at which time the Romans had possession of almost all the land. His first care was to discipline his infantry thoroughly; he then established himself on Mount Ercte (now Pellegrino, near Palermo), and from this point made pillaging excursions in all directions, sending his privateers along the coast of Italy as far north as Cumæ, thus obtaining abundant supplies for his troops. From this position the Romans endeavored to dislodge him, but in vain. After three years he left Ercte and established himself on Mount Eryx, keeping up his communication with Drepanum and the sea, where the same tactics were repeated on both sides, and with the same want of success on the part of the Romans. But the Carthaginian admiral having been totally defeated off the Ægates islands, 241 B. C., Hamilcar was compelled to abandon his fortress and evacuate Sicily. He was next appointed commander-in-chief of the Carthaginian army, and was engaged for some time in wars with the neighboring tribes, which were abruptly ended by his entering upon the Spanish campaign in (probably) 236 B. C. His great aim was to found a new empire in Spain, from which, as his basis, he might assail the Romans. He marched west, while the fleet under his son-in-law, Hasdrubal, cruised along the coast; he then crossed over at the strait of Gibraltar, and made war on Spain. He spent nine years in Spain, and at length, in 228 B. C., met his death on the field of battle while fighting against the Vettones. His military genius is considered scarcely inferior to that of his son Hannibal.

Hamilton, Alexander, celebrated American statesman, was born in the West India island of Nevis, 1757, son of a Scotch merchant who had married a young French widow. His father soon failed in business, and Alexander, at the age of twelve, had to enter the counting-house of a rich American merchant. His extraordinary abilities, however, induced some of his friends to procure for him a better education than could be secured at home. He was accordingly sent to a grammar-school at Elizabethtown, N. J.; and shortly afterward entered Columbia college, New York. On the first appearance of disagreement between Great Britain and her colonies, Hamilton, still a schoolboy, and barely eighteen, wrote a series of papers in defense of the rights of the latter, which were at first taken for the production of the statesman Jay, and which secured for the writer the notice and consideration of the popular leaders. On the outbreak of the war he obtained a commission as captain of artillery, gained the confidence of Washington, was made his aide-de-camp in 1777, and acquired the greatest influence with him as his friend and adviser. On the termination of the war he left the service with the rank of colonel, and, betaking himself to legal studies, soon became one of the most eminent lawyers in New York. In 1782 he was elected by the state of New York a representative to the continental congress; in 1786 he became a member of the New York legislature; and in 1787 he was appointed one of the delegates to the convention which met at Philadelphia, for the purpose of revising the articles of confederation. In conjunction with Madison, he had the most important share in drawing up the constitution afterward adopted. He was a strong supporter of the federal, as opposed to the democratic party; and, along with Jay and Madison, defended the constitution against all attacks, by a series of letters in the New York Daily Advertiser, afterward collected and published under the title of The Federalist. On the establishment of the new government in 1789, with Washington as president, Hamilton was appointed secretary of the treasury. The disorder of the public credit and the lack of official accounts of the state treasury rendered this office one of peculiar difficulty. In order to reëstablish public credit, he carried, in spite of much opposition, a measure for the funding of the domestic debt, founded a national bank, rearranged the system of duties, and altogether showed himself one of the greatest of American financiers. In 1795 he resigned his office, and resumed the practice of law in New York. When the war with France broke out in 1798, he was, according to the wish of Washington, made major-general of the United States army; and, on the death of Washington, he succeeded to the chief command. When peace was restored, he returned to his civil duties, but became involved in a political quarrel with Aaron Burr. This difference unhappily culminated in a duel in which Hamilton received a wound of which he died the following day, July 12, 1804.

Hamilton, Allan McLane, American physician, great-grandson of General Philip Schuyler and grandson of Alexander Hamilton, was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., 1848. He was graduated at the college of physicians and surgeons, New York, 1870; became a health inspector, 1873; later was physician in charge of the New York state hospital for diseases of the nervous system, and visiting physician to the epileptic and paralytic hospital on Blackwell's island, N. Y.; 1900–03, professor of mental diseases in Cornell university medical college, New York. He was appointed health officer of the port of New York in 1889. Author: Clinical Electro-Therapeutics; Nervous Diseases; Medical Jurisprudence; A System of Legal Medicine; Railway and Other Accidents; and many articles in medical journals.

Hamilton, Most Rev. Charles, bishop of Ottawa, 1896-1909, archbishop since 1909; was born at Hawkesbury, 1834. He was educated at Montreal high school and University college, Oxford; D. D., Bishop's college, 1885; D. C. L., Trinity college, Toronto, 1885; ordained, 1857; curate of Quebec cathedral, 1857-58; incumbent, St. Peters, Quebec, 1858–64; rector of St. Matthew's, Quebec, 1864–85, and bishop of Niagara, 1885–96.

Hamilton, Sir William, Scottish metaphysician, was born at Glasgow, 1788. He studied at Glasgow and Oxford, was admitted to the bar, but rarely practiced. He became, in 1821, professor of civil history at Edinburgh, and professor of logic and metaphysics there, 1836–56. From 1836, when he accepted the latter professorship, he was widely known as a philosophical writer. His chief books were an edition of Reid's works, Discussions in Philosophy, Literature and Education, Metaphysics, Logic, and his Lectures, published after his death. He left his library to the university of Glasgow. Died at Edinburgh, 1856.

Hamilton, Sir William Rowan, British mathematician, inventor of quaternions, was born in Dublin, 1805. He was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, and at nineteen commenced original investigation in conical refractions. In 1827 he was appointed professor of astronomy at Dublin and Irish astronomer-royal; in 1835 he was knighted. His earlier essays connected with caustics and contact of curves grew into the Theory of Systems of Rays, which helped to confirm the undulatory theory of light. He published many important treatises and papers, and his memoir on Algebra as the Science of Pure Time was one of the first steps to his great invention of quaternions. Published in 1853 a large volume of Lectures. He died in 1865.

Hamlin, Hannibal, American statesman, was born in Paris, Me., 1809. He practiced as a lawyer many years, and became a member of the state legislature. In 1842 he was elected to congress; was United States senator from 1848 to 1857, when he was elected governor on the republican ticket, but resigned immediately on again being elected senator. In 1861 he became vice-president under Lincoln, whose views he shared. He was again senator from 1869 to 1881, when he was named minister to Spain, 1881–83. He was chiefly instrumental in passing the "Wilmot proviso" through the house of representatives. Died, 1891.

Hammer, William Joseph, consulting engineer, was born in Schuylkill county, Pa., 1858; was educated in public schools of Newark, N. J., and attended the university and technical school lectures abroad. He was assistant to Edward Weston in Weston malleable nickel company, Newark, N. J., 1878; in 1880 became an assistant to Thomas A. Edison in the laboratory at Menlo Park, N. J., and was sent to England the following year to become chief engineer of the English Edison company; installed in London the first central station in the world for incandescent electric lighting. For two years he was chief engineer of the German Edison company, returning in 1884 to take charge of Edison's exhibits at the Franklin institute electrical exposition, the Crystal Palace electrical exposition and the Paris exposition of 1889. Was manager of the Boston Edison electric illuminating company for a year; installed the 8,000-light plant of Ponce de Leon hotel at St. Augustine, Florida. Since 1890 he has been engaged in practice as a consulting engineer. Member of many scientific societies.

Hammerstein (hăm'-ĕr-shtīn), Oscar, theater manager, was born in Berlin, Germany, 1847. He came to the United States in 1863; invented and patented several labor-saving devices; wrote three one-act comedies in German, 1868, which were produced in New York. He became lessee and manager of Stadt theater, New York, 1870; built Harlem opera house, 1880; later Columbus theater, Manhattan opera house, Olympia (now the New York) theater, Victoria theater, Belasco theater, and New opera house.

Hammond, James Bartlett, typewriter inventor, was born in Boston, 1839. He was graduated at the university of Vermont, 1861; was newspaper correspondent during civil war; graduate of Union theological seminary, 1865; studied philosophy and science at university of Halle, Germany; devoted many years to mechanical experiments; patented, 1880, a typewriting machine made on scientific principles; introduced "Ideal" keyboard and true alignment in the Hammond typewriter; put machine on market, 1884, and won highest honors in competitions. Collaborator on American translation of Lange's Commentary on The Psalms, 1884. Died, 1913.

Hammond, John Hays, mining engineer, was born in San Francisco, 1855. He was graduated at the Sheffield scientific school, Yale, 1876; M. A., Yale; pursued a mining course at royal school of mines, Freiberg, Saxony. Special expert of United States geological survey, 1880, examining California gold fields; later in Mexico, and afterward consulting engineer of Union iron works, San Francisco, and to Central and Southern Pacific railways. He has examined properties in all parts of the world; became consulting engineer for Barnato Bros., 1893, and later for Cecil Rhodes, of whom he became a strong supporter. Was consulting engineer of consolidated gold fields of South Africa, British South Africa company, and the Randfontein Estates gold mining company. Was one of four leaders in reform movement in the Transvaal, 1895-96; after Jameson raid (with which he was not in sympathy), he was arrested and sentenced to death. Sentence was afterward commuted to fifteen years' imprisonment; and later he was released on payment of a fine of $125,000. He then went to London and became interested in many large mining companies. Has traveled extensively, examining mines in United States and Mexico. Special ambassador to coronation of King George V. of England, 1911.

Hammond, William Alexander, American physician, was born in Annapolis, Md., 1828. He was graduated from the medical department of the university of the city of New York, and entered the United States army in 1848 as assistant surgeon. In 1860 he was appointed professor of anatomy and physiology in the university of Maryland. At the beginning of the civil war he resigned his professorship, and entered the army as an assistant surgeon. When the medical bureau was organized, in 1862, he was appointed surgeon-general of the army, with the rank of brigadier-general, and served as such until 1864. In that year he was court-martialed and dismissed from the army, but in 1878 was reinstated. He practiced his profession in New York, where he made a specialty of nervous diseases. From 1867 to 1873 he was professor in Bellevue hospital medical college; and from 1873 to 1882 in New York university. He published Diseases of the Nervous System, Insanity in its Relation to Crime, On Certain Conditions of Nervous Derangement, etc. Died, 1900.

Hampden, John, celebrated English patriot, was born in London in 1594. He graduated at Oxford, studied law, and in 1621 entered the house of commons as member for the borough of Grampound. In 1627, for refusing to pay his proportion of the general loan which the king attempted to raise on his own authority, Hampden was committed to close imprisonment in the Gatehouse. Subsequently he was removed to Hampshire, but, with others, was unconditionally liberated by order of council. After the dissolution of the parliament of 1628-29 he retired to his estate, and devoted himself to study and to country sports and occupations. In the short parliament of 1640 he took a prominent part in the great contest between the crown and the house of commons. To the long parliament he was returned both for Wendover and the county of Buckingham. For his resistance to the king's proceedings he was one of the five members whom Charles, in 1642, rashly attempted in person to seize in the house of commons; and on the breaking out of the civil war he raised and became colonel of a regiment in the parliamentary army under the earl of Essex. He was present at the repulse of the royalists at Southam, at their defeat near Aylesbury, at the fight of Edgehill, and at the assault and capture of Reading. Prince Rupert having attacked a parliamentary force at Chinnor, near Thame, Hampden put himself at the head of a few cavalry that were rallied in haste to oppose him, and in the fight that ensued at Chalgrove Field received in the first charge a wound, of which he died, 1643.

Hampton, Wade, American politician and soldier, was born at Columbia, S. C., 1818. He was a grandson of General Wade Hampton, and, though opposed to secession, he joined the confederate army and raised a force called "Hampton's legion." These troops he led with distinction at the first battle of Bull Run. He subsequently served at Seven Pines, Antietam, Gettysburg, and commanded a body of cavalry in 1865. He attained the rank of lieutenant-general, and was thrice wounded. In 1877–79 he was governor of South Carolina; United States senator, 1879–91, and United States commissioner of railroads, 1893–97. He died in 1902.

Hanaford (hăn′-ȧ-fẽrd), Phebe Anne, Universalist minister, was born at Nantucket, Mass., 1829. She was the daughter of Captain George W. Coffin, and married, in 1849, Joseph H. Hanaford. She taught school; edited the Ladies' Repository and The Myrtle, 1866–68; became a lecturer on literary and reform topics, and was ordained, 1868, the first woman minister ordained in New England. She held pastorates at Hingham and Waltham, Mass., New Haven, Conn., and Jersey City. Author: Life of Abraham Lincoln; Our Martyred President (poem); Life of George Peabody; Lucretia, the Quakeress; Leonette, or Truth Sought and Found; The Best of Books and Its History; Field, Gunboat and Hospital; Women of the Century; Life of Dickens; Heart of Siasconset; From Shore to Shore and Other Poems, etc.

Hancock, John, American patriot, was born in 1737. He was one of the leaders in the revolt in Massachusetts, the seizure of his sloop, Liberty, being the occasion of a riot in Boston. He was very active in denouncing the "Boston massacre," and was one of the persons whose seizure was attempted by the expedition which led to the battle of Lexington. He was president of the continental congress from 1775–77, and governor of Massachusetts, 1780–85, 1787–93, and the first signer of the declaration of independence. He presided at the constitutional convention of 1788, and favored the adoption of the proposed federal constitution. Died, 1793.

Hancock, Winfield Scott, American general, was born in Pennsylvania, 1824. After graduating at West Point in 1844, he served with great gallantry during the Mexican war. Appointed brigadier-general of volunteers in 1861, he took part in the campaign on the Potomac, fought at Antietam, and commanded a corps in the battle of Gettysburg, where he was wounded, 1863. In 1864 he became brigadier-general in the regular army, in 1866 a major-general, and held from August, 1867, until March, 1868, the command of the 5th military district. In 1880 he was the unsuccessful democratic nominee for president. At his death, in 1886, he was in command of the department of the East.

Handel (hăn′-dĕl), George Frederick. See page 164.

Hanly, J. Frank, lawyer, ex-governor of Indiana, was born in St. Joseph, Ill., 1863. He was educated in common schools, Champaign county, Ill., taught school for nine years in Warren county, Ind., and was admitted to the bar in 1889. He practiced at Williamsport, Ind., 1889–96; was elected to the state senate, 1890; elected to congress, 1894, serving one term, and was a candidate for the United States senate, 1899. He was governor of Indiana, 1905–09.

Hanna, Hugh Henry, was born at Lafayette, Ind., 1848. He received a liberal education in United States and Germany; hon. M. A., Harvard, 1900. Began business in his father's bank at Lafayette, Ind., removed to Indianapolis, 1880, and is now president of the Atlas engine works. He became head of monetary movement that resulted in gold standard legislation; devoted three years to the work, beginning with call issued by board of trade, Indianapolis, 1896, for a monetary conference; organized the monetary commission which developed plan of currency reform, part of which was included in legislation enacted by congress, 1900.

Hanna, Marcus Alonzo, American politician and legislator, was born in New Lisbon, Columbiana county, Ohio, 1837. He was educated in the Cleveland public schools and at Western Reserve university, leaving college, however, before graduation. He began his career in his father's wholesale grocery house. In 1867 entered the firm of Rhodes and Company, dealers in coal and iron, and ten years later the firm name was changed to M. A. Hanna and Company. He subsequently engaged in lake transportation, banking, mining, and railroading. He was appointed to the United States senate as a republican by Governor Bushnell, 1897, to fill a vacancy caused by the resignation of John Sherman, who resigned to accept the position of secretary of state in President McKinley's cabinet, and took his seat March 5, 1897. His term of service under the appointment expired in January, 1898, and he was elected for a full term, and served until his death in 1904. He proved a remarkable political organizer, was a man of excellent judgment, and an effective debater.

Hannibal, Carthaginian general, the famous son of Hamilcar Barca, was born in 247 B. C. At nine years he accompanied his father on his Spanish expedition, and before starting swore an oath of eternal hatred to the Roman name. He spent two years in contests with some tribes hitherto independent of Carthage. He attacked Saguntum, a city in alliance with Rome, for making aggressions on the Torboletes, subjects of Carthage. After eight months' siege the city was taken, and the Romans, after unsuccessfully demanding the surrender of the general who had thus wantonly violated the treaty, declared war in 218 B. C. Hannibal started from New Carthage in 218 B. C. with 90,000 foot and 12,000 horse. The force was very much thinned by contests with the tribes between the Iberus and the Pyrenees. From the Pyrenees he marched to the Rhone without opposition, since Scipio was at Massilia (Marseilles), four days' march from the point where Hannibal crossed the river in the face of the Celtic hordes who sided with the Romans. He effected the passage of the Alps in fifteen days, in spite of the attacks of the mountain tribes, the snow, storms, and other difficulties. He first subdued the Taurini, a hostile tribe, took their chief city after a siege of three days, and thus forced into alliance with him all the Ligurian and Celtic tribes on the upper course of the Po. Scipio, having returned from Massilia, took command of the army in the north of Italy, and first met Hannibal on the plain near the river Ticinus. The Romans were entirely routed, and Scipio, severely wounded, retreated across the Po. Hannibal next inflicted a severe defeat, near Lake Thrasymene, on the consul Flaminius. He then crossed the Apennines to Picenum and Apulia, and thence recrossed to the fertile Campania, which he ravaged. He wintered in Geronium, and in June, or, according to others, in August, 216 B. C., almost annihilated a Roman army of 90,000 men under Terentius Varro and Æmilius Paulus. In this battle about 50,000 are said to have fallen, including Æmilius Paulus. Hannibal traversed Italy in all directions, surprised the Roman generals, defeated their armies, captured their towns, such as Casilinum, Arpi, Tarentum, Metapontum, Thurii, Locri, and many others; he defeated Centenius near Capua; Cn. Fulvius at Herdonea; Fulvius Flaccus on the Anio; Crispinus and Marcellus in Lucania; and the besieging army before Locri; in all these cases the armies were almost annihilated. The defeat of Hasdrubal, his brother, at the river Metaurus, and the loss of his army, compelled Hannibal to confine himself to the mountainous peninsula of Bruttium, where for four years he resisted all the efforts of the Romans to dislodge him. At length, after having maintained himself in Italy for upward of fifteen years, he was recalled to Africa, to defend his country against Scipio; but notwithstanding his utmost exertions and the bravery of his veteran troops he was defeated near Zama with a loss of 20,000 men, 202 B. C. The surrender of Hannibal was one of the conditions of peace; but, foreseeing such a result, he fled to Bithynia, and, seeing no hope of escape, he committed suicide by taking poison, 183 B. C.

Hardenberg (här'-den-bĕrk), Karl August, Prince von, Prussian statesman, was born at Essenroda in Hanover, 1750. After holding appointments in Hanover, Brunswick, Ansbach, and Bayreuth, on Bayreuth's union to Prussia in 1791 he became a Prussian minister, and in 1804 first Prussian minister. His policy was to preserve neutrality in the war between France and England; but in 1806, under Napoleon's influence, he was dismissed. In 1810 he was appointed chancellor, and addressed himself to the task of completing the reforms begun by Stein. In the war of liberation he played a prominent part, and after the treaty of Paris, in 1814, was made a prince. He took part in the congress of Vienna, and in the treaties of Paris. He reorganized the council of state, of which he was appointed president, and drew up the new Prussian system of imposts. To Hardenberg Prussia is mainly indebted for the improvements in her army system, the abolition of serfdom and the privileges of the nobles, the encouragement of municipalities, and the reform of education. Died, 1822.

Harley, Robert, earl of Oxford and Mortimer, British statesman, was born in 1661. He entered parliament which met under the chieftainship of Rochester and Godolphin in 1689, and in 1701, was, by a large majority, elected speaker. He retained this post until 1704, when he became secretary of state. The principal act of his administration was the treaty of Utrecht. Having ceased to pay court to Lady Masham, Bolingbroke succeeded in getting him dismissed in 1714. Lord Oxford was dismissed on a Tuesday — Bolingbroke became premier — and Queen Anne died on the next Sunday. Both of the rivals, formerly colleagues, were justly suspected of having conspired to restore the Stuarts on the death of the queen. When George I. was proclaimed, Bolingbroke fled to France, but Oxford remained to meet his fate. He was sent to the Tower, and after two years' imprisonment brought to trial. The two houses quarreled as to the mode of procedure, and the commons having in anger refused to take any part in the trial, he was acquitted and released. He spent the remainder of his life in retirement. Died, 1724.

He was educated at Wadham college, Oxford, became fellow and tutor of his college, and was called to the bar in 1858. He practiced conveyancing and in the courts of equity, sat on the royal commission upon trades-unions, 1867–69, served as secretary to the commission on the digest of the law, 1869-70, and from 1877 until 1889 was professor of jurisprudence and international law at Lincoln's Inn. A positivist and an advanced liberal, he has written The Meaning of History; Order and Progress; The Present and the Future; Lectures on Education; The Choice of Books; Oliver Cromwell; Annals of an old Manor House; Early Victorian Literature; William the Silent; Byzantine History, etc. From 1889 to 1893 he was an alderman of the London county council.

Harrison, James Albert, American philologist, educator, was born at Pass Christian, Miss., 1848. He was graduated at the university of Virginia, 1868; studied in Germany, 1871; L. H. D., Columbia, 1887; LL. D., Washington and Lee university, and Randolph-Macon college, Va.; professor of Latin and modern languages, Randolph-Macon college, 1871–76; professor of English and modern languages, Washington and Lee, 1876–95; professor of English and romance languages, 1895; later professor Teutonic languages, university of Virginia; was lecturer on Anglo-Saxon poetry, Johns Hopkins. Author: Group of Poets and Their Haunts; Greek Vignettes; Spain in Profile; French Syntax; History of Spain; Story of Greece; Autrefois, a collection of Creole tales; Dictionary of Anglo-Saxon Poetry (with W. M. Baskervill), etc. Editor of Beowulf; Heine's Reisebilder; Library of Anglo-Saxon Poetry (5 vols.); Mme. De Sévigné's Letters; Corneille's Nicomède; E. A. Poe's complete works (17 vols.). Joint author of Anglo-Saxon Reader; Anglo-Saxon Dictionary; Easy French Lessons; Life of George Washington. One of editors of Century Dictionary and Standard Dictionary. Died, 1911.

Harrison, John, British inventor of the chronometer, was born at Foulby near Pontefract, 1693. By 1726 he had constructed a time keeper with compensating apparatus for correcting errors due to variations of climate. In 1713 the government had offered three prizes for the discovery of a method to determine the longitude accurately. After long perseverance Harrison made a chronometer which, in a voyage to Jamaica in 1761-62, determined the longitude within eighteen geographical miles. After further trials, he was awarded the largest prize of 20,000 pounds. He also invented the gridiron pendulum, the going fusee, and the remontoir escapement. He wrote five works on his chronometer, etc. Died, 1776.

Harrison, William Henry, ninth president of the United States, was born in Virginia, 1773, son of Benjamin Harrison, who signed the declaration of independence. On the death of his father he joined, in 1791, as ensign, the army which Wayne was leading against the Indians of the Northwest. He left the army in 1798; in 1801 he became governor of Indiana territory, and as its representative in congress succeeded in passing a law relating to the sale of the federal land in small parcels, to which the western states ascribe much of their prosperity. In the war against the Indians in 1811, and which soon became also a war against the English in Canada, Harrison, as commander-in-chief of the American army, showed great military talent. He defeated the Indians in an important battle at Tippecanoe, and by the victory of Perry on Lake Erie was enabled to pursue the British invaders into Canada, where, in 1813, he totally routed them in the battle of the Thames. In 1814 he resigned his commission; in 1816 he was elected to congress, and in 1824 became a member of the United States senate. In 1828 he went as ambassador to Colombia, but was recalled in 1829, and the following few years he spent in retirement as clerk in a county court in Ohio. The whig party tried in vain to make him president of the United States in 1836, and succeeded in 1840. He died, 1841, after serving one month.

Hart, Albert Bushnell, American educator and historian, was born in Clarksville, Pa., 1854. He was graduated at Harvard, 1880; Ph. D., Freiburg, Baden, 1883; LL. D., Richmond college, 1902. From 1897 to 1910 he was professor of history, professor of government since 1910, Harvard university. Author: Introduction to the Study of Federal Government; Epoch Maps; Formation of the Union; Practical Essays on American Government; Studies in American Education; Guide to the Study of American History (with Edward Channing); Salmon Portland Chase; Handbook of the History, Diplomacy, and Government of the United States; Foundations of American Foreign Policy; Actual Government; Essentials of American History. Editor: Epochs of American History (3 vols.); American History Told by Contemporaries (4 vols.); American Citizen Series; Source-Book of American History; Source Readers in American History (4 vols.); The American Nation, etc. Joint editor: American History Leaflets, 1895-1910; since 1910, Cyclopædia of American government.

Hart, James McDougal, American landscape painter was born in Kilmarnock, Scotland, 1828. When a child he removed with his family to America, and lived at Albany, N. Y. About 1851 he went to Düsseldorf and studied painting for a year. He returned to Albany and later removed to New York city, where he continued to reside. He was made an academician in 1859. His pictures are admired for their harmony of color and quiet peacefulness of tone. The best known among them are: "Woods in Autumn"; "Moonrise in the Adirondacks"; "Peaceful Homes"; "Coming Out of the Shade"; "On the March"; "Among Friends"; "Threatening Weather"; "Indian Summer"; "A Misty Morning." Died at Brooklyn, N. Y., 1901.

Hart, Joel T., American sculptor, was born in Kentucky, 1810. He learned the mason's trade, educated himself, and while working as a stonecutter at Lexington he began modeling busts in clay. He soon attained a phenomenal success in portrait busts, and on receiving a commission for a marble statue of Henry Clay, 1849, went to Florence to study and work. Besides the marble statue of Clay for Richmond, he made one of that statesman in bronze for New Orleans, and another in marble for Louisville. He executed many busts and statues of eminent men during his twenty-eight years' residence in Florence. He died in 1877, and his remains were removed from Florence to Lexington, Ky., 1884, where the state erected a monument over them.

Hart, Sir Robert, British diplomat, was born at Milltown, County Armagh, Ireland, 1835. He was educated at Queen's college, Taunton, Wesley college, Dublin, and Queen's college, Belfast, graduating from the last in 1853; M. A., 1871; hon. LL. D., 1882. Entered British consular service in China, 1854; assistant, British consulate, Ningpo, 1855; second assistant, British consulate, Canton, 1858; secretary to allied commissioners for the government of the city of Canton, 1858; interpreter, British consulate, Canton, 1858; granted special permission to resign and accept appointment in Chinese imperial maritime customs, 1859; officiating inspector-general, 1861–63; commissioner at Shanghai, with charge of Yangtze ports and Ningpo, 1863; inspector-general, 1863; gazetted minister plenipotentiary, 1885, but declined. Author of These From the Land of Sinim, etc. Died, 1911.

Hart, William, American painter, brother of James McDougal Hart, was born in Scotland, 1823. He came to Albany, N. Y., 1831, and, like his brother, developed a taste for landscape painting, and in 1848 exhibited a specimen of his work in the national academy of design in New York. In 1849 he returned to his native country for study. On returning to America he settled in New York, and soon became an academician. For several years he was president of the Brooklyn academy of design. Some of his most notable works are: "The Last Gleam"; "The Golden Hour"; "Opening in the Elands"; "Up the Glen in the White Mountains"; "Sunset in Dark Harbor, New Brunswick." He was one of the founders, and for some years president of the water-color society, and was himself eminent in that branch of art. He was remarkable for luminous brilliancy of coloring, particularly in skies. Died, 1894.

Harte (härt), Francis Bret, American writer, was born in Albany, N. Y., 1839. He was at different times a miner, school teacher, printer, and editor. From 1864 to 1870 he was in San Francisco as secretary of the United States mint, and, in 1870, he published The Heathen Chinee. He was named American consul at Crefeld in 1878, at Glasgow in 1880, and after leaving the latter in 1885, lived in London. Chief among his works are Condensed Novels; The Luck of Roaring Camp and Other Sketches; Poetical Works; Tales of the Argonauts; The Twins of Table Mountain and Other Stories; By Shore and Sedge; A Millionaire of Rough and Ready; Devil's Ford; A Ward of the Golden Gate, etc. Died, 1902.

Hartley, Sir Charles Augustus, British engineer, engineer-in-chief and consulting engineer to the European commission of the Danube, 1856–1907, was born at Heworth, in Durham, 1825. He served in Crimea as captain in the Anglo-Turkish contingent, 1855-56, and in 1867 reported to foreign office on important questions of engineering connected with the river Scheldt. In the same year he designed plans for the enlargement of the port of Odessa, for which he was awarded the emperor of Russia's grand competition prize of 8,000 silver rubles. He was appointed member of a board of engineers to report on the improvement of the Mississippi, 1875; was nominated by the British government member of international technical commission of Suez canal, 1884, and served until 1907; has been consulted at various periods by the Indian, Austrian, Russian, Egyptian, Rumanian, and Bulgarian governments on the improvement of the Hugli below Calcutta, and harbor of Madras, the enlargement of the port of Trieste, the consolidation of the Nile Barrage below Cairo, the improvement of the Don and Dnieper, and on commercial harbors of Constanza, Bourgas, and Varna. Author: Delta of the Danube; Public Works in the United States and Canada; Inland Navigations in Europe; History of the Engineering Works of the Suez Canal, etc.

Hartley, David, British philosopher, was born near Halifax, 1705. A clergyman's son, at fifteen he entered Jesus college, Cambridge, and in 1727 became a fellow. He studied for the church, but, dissenting from some points in the thirty-nine articles, abandoned his intention. In his mature years he impugned the eternity of hell-punishment; in all other points he remained a devout member of the church of England. As a medical practitioner he attained considerable eminence at Newark, Bury St. Edmunds, London, and Bath. His chief work is Observations on Man. Died, 1757.

Hartmann, Karl Robert Eduard von, German philosopher, was born at Berlin, 1842. He served as an artillery officer, 1860–65, but from 1867 until his death lived in Berlin, working out his philosophical scheme, a synthesis of Hegel, Schelling, and Schopenhauer, in which "the Unconscious" plays the rôle of creator and providence. His great work was The Philosophy of the Unconscious, followed by books on the ethical consciousness, the development of the religious consciousness, German æsthetics, Lotze, and Kant, besides a work on the self-destruction of Christianity, criticisms of neo-Kantianism and contemporary philosophies, defenses of his own system, and political and educational treatises. A pessimist as regards the inevitable misery of existence, he was an optimist as champion of evolutionary progress. He died in 1906.

Harvard, John, founder of Harvard college, was born in Southwark, England, 1607. He was graduated at Emmanuel college, Cambridge, England, 1631; married and came to America, 1637; was made a freeman of Massachusetts, and given a tract of land in Charlestown, where he began preaching as a Congregational minister. In his will he bequeathed about 750 pounds and 320 volumes from his library for the establishment of a college. He died at Charlestown, Mass., 1638. A granite monument was erected over his remains in Charlestown, 1828, and a memorial statue on the delta at the university was unveiled in 1884.

Harvey, George Brinton McClellan, editor of the North American Review, and Harper's Weekly; was born in Peacham, Vt., 1864. He was educated at Peacham academy; was consecutively reporter on the Springfield Republican, Chicago News, and the New York World; was later managing editor of the New York World, insurance commissioner, New Jersey, colonel and aide-de-camp of Governors Green and Abbett, New Jersey. He was the constructor and president of various electric railroads, 1894-98, and bought the North American Review in 1899. He has been president of Harper and Brothers since 1900, and bought the Metropolitan Magazine, 1903. He was made honorary doctor of laws by Erskine college, South Carolina, 1905, and by the university of Nevada, 1908. Was Bromley lecturer on journalism at Yale, 1908.

Harvey, William. See page 354.

Hase (hä'-zĕ), Karl August von, German theologian, was born at Steinbach in Saxony, 1800. He was expelled from Erlangen university for his connection with the political "Burschenschaften," became in 1823 tutor at Tübingen, but after a new trial was imprisoned for ten months. From 1830 to 1883 he was professor of theology at Jena, after which he was ennobled. His chief writings are: Des Alten Pfarrers Testament; Handbook of Dogmatics; Gnosis; Life of Jesus; Church History; Francis of Assisi; Handbook of Protestant Polemical Theology; Life of St. Catharine of Siena; and lectures on church history. Died, 1890.

Haskell, Charles Nathaniel, governor of Oklahoma, 1907-11, was born in Putnam county, Ohio, 1860. He was reared on a farm, taught school and read law, and was admitted to the bar in 1881. He began practice at Ottawa, Ohio; engaged in railway building and other construction work, 1888; went to Muskogee, I. T., 1901, and built many lines of railroad there. Was member of Oklahoma constitutional convention, and was elected first governor of the state of Oklahoma, 1907.

Hassall (hăs'-al), Arthur, British historical writer, was born at Bebington, Cheshire, 1853. He was graduated at Trinity college, Oxford; was lecturer and tutor of Keble college, 1880–83; student of Christ Church, 1884; censor of Christ Church, 1894-95, and student and tutor since 1895. Author: Life of Bolingbroke; Louis XIV.; A Handbook of European History; The Balance of Power; A Class Book of English History; History of France; The French People; Mazarin; The Tudor Dynasty; War and Reform; The Expansion of Great Britain, etc.

Hassam, Childe, American artist, was born in 1859. He was educated in Boston public schools, and studied art in Boston and Paris, 1886–89. He has exhibited widely in this country and in Europe, and follows generally the methods of the French impressionist school. His pictures are represented in the collections of the Pennsylvania academy of fine arts; Carnegie institute, Pittsburgh; Cincinnati museum; Corcoran art gallery, Washington; Boston art club, etc.

Hastings, Warren, English statesman and administrator in India, was born in 1732. He went to Bengal as a writer in 1750, and was seven years later appointed agent of the East India company at the court of the nabob of Bengal. In 1764 he returned to England, where he remained four years studying Eastern literature. On his return to India he became a member of the council of Madras, and in 1772 governor of Bengal, a position which, in 1774, became that of governor-general of India. He was now involved in quarrels with his council, and sent in his resignation, which, however, when accepted, he disavowed. The supreme court decided in his favor, and he was reappointed. During his first term of office he sold the vale of Rohilcund to Siraj-ud Dowlah and obtained the execution of Nuncomar, his enemy. During his second term, in order to obtain money, he took those measures against the rajah of Benares and the nabob of Oude which were afterward charged against him, but left the affairs of the company in a very prosperous condition. Three years after his return he was impeached before the lords for high crimes and misdemeanors, but, after a trial which proceeded at intervals for seven years, and in spite of the eloquence of Burke and Sheridan, he was acquitted in 1795. He was ruined by the expense, but was granted an annuity by the court of directors. To him the British government is largely indebted for its political and judicial organization in India and its method of Indian administration. Died, 1818.

Hauff (houf), Wilhelm, German novelist, was born at Stuttgart, 1802. He studied at Tübingen, was for two years a tutor, and had been editor of a paper for nearly a year when he died, 1827. His Märchen and his Novellen are admirable for their simplicity and playful fancy. His other works include: Die Bettlerin vom Pont des Arts; Das Bild des Kaisers; Lichtenstein, an imitation of Scott; and Mitteilungen aus den Memoiren des Satans, a story rich in satiric humor.

Haupt (houpt), Lewis Muhlenberg, American civil engineer, was born at Gettysburg, Pa., 1844. He attended the Lawrence scientific school, Harvard, and graduated at the United States military academy, 1867. He was lieutenant-engineer in lake surveys, 1868; engineer officer of the 5th military district Texas, 1869; professor civil engineering, university of Pennsylvania, 1872–92. Member of the Nicaragua canal commission, 1897–99; Isthmian canal commission, 1899-1902; president Colombia Cauca arbitration, 1897; chief engineer survey for ship canal across New Jersey, 1894; consulting engineer of Lake Erie and Ohio River ship canal, etc. He edited The American Engineering Register, 1885-86. Author: Engineering Specifications and Contracts; The Topographer — His Methods and Instruments; Physical Phenomena of Harbor Entrances; Special Report on Railway Plant of Paris Exposition; Canals and Their Economic Relation to Transportation; A Move for Better Roads; and a number of pamphlets and other contributions to engineering.

Haupt, Paul, philologist, professor of Semitic languages and director of oriental seminary, Johns Hopkins, since 1883, was born at Görlitz, Germany, 1858. He was graduated at Gymnasium Augustum, Görlitz, 1876; university of Leipzig, Ph. D., 1878; LL. D., university of Glasgow, 1902; post-graduate studies at Leipzig and Berlin universities, and British museum. He was tutor at the university of Göttingen, 1880–83; professor extraordinarius of Assyriology, same, until 1889. Editor: The Polychrome Bible, New Critical Edition of Hebrew Text of the Old Testament. Co-editor: The Assyriological Library; The Johns Hopkins Contributions to Assyriology and Comparative Semitic Grammar. Author: The Sumerian Family Laws; Akkadian and Sumerian Cuneiform Texts in British Museum; The Babylonian Nimrod Epic; The Cuneiform Account of the Deluge; The Akkadian Language; Koheleth; The Book of Canticles; The Book of Ecclesiastes; and numerous papers on biblical and Assyrian philology, history and archæology, comparative Semitic grammar, Sumerian, etc.

Hauptmann, Gerhart, German dramatic poet, was born in Salzbrunn, Silesia, 1862. At eighteen he decided to become a sculptor and entered the royal college of art, Breslau. In 1882 he went to the university of Jena, and spent most of 1883 and 1884 in Italy. Settled in Berlin in 1885, devoting himself to literary work. He has written: Vor Sonnenaufgang; Das Friedensfest; Einsame Menschen; Die Weber; Kollege Crampton; Der Biberpelz; Florian Geyer; Fuhrmann Henschel; Rose Berndt; Die Versunkene Glocke, and Und Pippa Tanzt. Received Nobel prize for literature, 1912.

Haussmann (ōs′-män′), Georges Eugène, French magistrate, was born in Paris, 1809. He entered the public service, and under Napoleon III. became prefect of the Seine in 1853. He then began his task of improving Paris by widening streets, laying out boulevards and parks, building bridges, etc. For these services he was made baron and senator; but the heavy burden of debt laid upon the citizens led to his dismissal in 1870. In 1871 he was appointed director of the Crédit Mobilier, and in 1881 was elected to the chamber of deputies. He died, 1891.

Havelock (hăv′-lŏk), Sir Henry, English general, was born at Bishop-Wearmouth, in Durham, 1795. He entered the army a month or two after the battle of Waterloo, went to India in 1823, and honorably distinguished himself in the Afghan and Sikh wars. In 1856 he commanded a division of the army that invaded Persia. While absent in that country news arrived of the Indian mutiny, and he hastened to Calcutta. He was directed to organize a small movable column at Allahabad, and to push on to the relief of the British at Cawnpore and Lucknow. He made a forced march to Futtehpur, where, at the head of 2,000 men, he engaged and broke the rebels. He continued his march upon Cawnpore, and twice defeated the enemy. The consequence of the latter victory was the massacre of all the European women and children in the hands of Nana Sahib. After fighting eight battles with the rebels, in all of which he was victorious, his little army found itself so thinned by fatigue and sickness that it was obliged to retire upon Cawnpore. Early in September, General Outram arrived with reënforcements, and Havelock again advanced to the relief of Lucknow. Outram, with chivalrous generosity, refusing to take the command out of his hands, Havelock and his column, with desperate bravery, fought their way through streets of houses, each forming a separate fortress, until they gained the British residency, to the indescribable joy of the beleagured garrison. The victorious army were now in turn besieged, but held their own until November, when Sir Colin Campbell (Lord Clyde) forced his way to their rescue. After the relief of Lucknow Havelock was attacked by dysentery, and died in 1857.

Haven, Erastus Otis, bishop of the Methodist Episcopal church, was born in Boston, 1820. He was a graduate of Wesleyan university at Middletown, Conn.; held a professor's chair at Amenia seminary for two years, and was engaged in pastoral work from 1848–53, when he accepted a professorship in the university of Michigan. He became editor of Zion's Herald, in Boston, 1856, and left in 1863 to become president of the university of Michigan. He resigned his office to accept a similar position in the Northwestern university at Evanston, Ill., 1869, and remained there for three years. In 1874 he was elected chancellor of Syracuse university. Elected bishop at general conference, 1880. Died, 1881.

Haven, Joseph, American clergyman and educator, was born in Massachusetts, 1816. He was graduated at Amherst, studied in Union theological seminary, and graduated at Andover theological seminary, 1839. After officiating as pastor in Congregational churches in Brookline and Ashland, Mass., he was chosen professor of moral and mental philosophy in Amherst college in 1850, and from 1858–70 occupied the chair of systematic theology in Chicago theological seminary. In 1870 he traveled in Europe and the East. In 1874 he was professor of mental and moral philosophy in Chicago university. He published Mental Philosophy, Moral Philosophy, and Studies in Philosophy and Theology. Died, 1874.

Hawkins, Anthony Hope, English novelist, was born in London, 1863. He was graduated from Balliol college, Oxford; received his M. A. there; and was admitted as a barrister of the Middle Temple, 1887. Author: The Prisoner of Zenda; The God in the Car; The Dolly Dialogues; Rupert of Hentzau; The King's Mirror; Quisanté; Tristram of Blent; The Intrusions of Peggy; Double Harness; A Servant of the Public; Sophie of Kravonia; Tales of Two People; The Great Miss Driver, etc. Plays: The Adventure of Lady Ursula, Pilkerton's Peerage, etc.

Hawthorne, Julian, American novelist, journalist, historical writer, biographer, was born in Boston, Mass., 1846. He was educated at Harvard, and at Dresden, Germany; lived in Europe, 1853–60; at Concord and Cambridge, Mass., 1860–68; Dresden, Germany, 1868–69; New York city, as hydrographic engineer in dock department, 1869–71; Dresden, 1871–73; London and neighborhood, 1874–81; New York, 1881–89; Europe, 1889; New York, 1890–94; Jamaica, West Indies, 1894–97; India, 1897; New York, 1898 to present; but he has not practiced as engineer since 1871. He has written: Saxon Studies; Garth; Archibald Malmaison; Sebastian Strome; Dust; Fortune's Fool; Sinfire; Biography of Nathaniel Hawthorne; History of Oregon; History of United States (3 vols.); History of American Literature; Fool of Nature ($10,000 prize novel); Love is a Spirit; Hawthorne and His Circle; and many others. He was reviewer on London Spectator, 1877–81, and literary editor New York World, 1885.

Hawthorne, Nathaniel, celebrated American novelist, was born at Salem, Mass., 1804. He was graduated at Bowdoin college in 1825, and three years later published his first novel, Fanshawe. He then wrote a number of stories for the journals, which he afterward collected in 1837, and published under the title of Twice-told Tales, a second volume of which appeared in 1842. In 1843 he took up his residence at the charming village of Concord, in a manse which had formerly been the dwelling of Emerson, and which suggested the title of his next work, Mosses from an Old Manse, published in 1843. These sketchs, in which he gives some interesting recollections of his boyhood, first made his name known in Europe. In 1842 he published The Liberty Tree, and in 1845 The Journal of an African Cruiser. After a three years' residence at Concord he accepted a situation in the custom-house at Salem, and removed to that city. This, however, did not stop his literary work. The Scarlet Letter appeared in 1850, and was received with universal approbation, as was likewise The House of the Seven Gables, published in 1851. His Blithedale Romance, published in 1852, may be regarded as a kind of autobiography so far as it goes, and is founded on incidents in his own life. In 1853 he received the appointment of consul at Liverpool from his friend and classmate, President Pierce, whose life he had written. He resided in Liverpool discharging the duties of his office for five years, and afterward went to Italy to recruit his impaired health — a journey which furnished him with material for his fantastic romance, The Marble Faun, generally regarded as one of the best of his works. After his return to America he published a sketch of England and the English. He died suddenly at Plymouth, N. H., 1864. As a writer he combined a true poetic spirit with a charming style, and displayed a deep knowledge of human nature. As a character analyst no American writer excels him.

Hay, John, American statesman and writer, was born in Salem, Ind., 1838. He was graduated from Brown university, 1858, and settled in Illinois as a lawyer. He went to Washington in 1861, as one of Lincoln's private secretaries, acting also as his aide-de-camp. He served under Generals Hunter and Gillmore with the rank of major and assistant adjutant-general. He was subsequently in the United States diplomatic service, stationed at Paris, Vienna, and Madrid. In 1897 he was made ambassador to England, and in 1898 secretary of state. In the latter capacity he inaugurated the important "open door" policy, for all nations, in China, and laid the foundation for subsequent diplomatic relations with the Orient. As secretary of state he gained a standing equal to that of the most eminent men who have held that high office. In coolness, foresight, and statesmanlike appreciation of current and coming events he had no superior among contemporary diplomats. His literary reputation rests upon Pike County Ballads, Castilian Days, a volume of travel, and Life of Abraham Lincoln (with J. G. Nicolay). Died, 1905.

Haydn, Joseph, Austrian composer, was born at Rohrau, Austria, 1732. He was the son of a poor wheelwright, and, manifesting great musical talent, he was received, at the age of eight, into the choir of the cathedral of St. Stephen's at Vienna. Subsequently Metastasio introduced him to the celebrated singer, Porpora, who employed Haydn to accompany him on the piano during his singing lessons, and from whom Haydn obtained the instruction in composition he so anxiously desired and needed. In the latter part of 1750 he composed his first quartet for stringed instruments. In 1759 a certain Count Morzin engaged him as music director and composer, "with a salary of 200 florins, free lodgings and table with his secretaries and other officials." In 1760 Prince Esterhazy placed him at the head of his private chapel. For him Haydn composed his beautiful symphonies and the greater number of his magnificent quartets. He is often called "Father Haydn," as having been the inventor of the symphonic form as we now essentially know it. After the death of Prince Esterhazy, in 1790, Haydn accompanied Salomon, the violinist, to England, where, in 1791-92, he produced six of his "Twelve Grand Symphonies." In England he first obtained that recognition which afterward fell to his share in his own country. On his return to Austria he purchased a small house with a garden in one of the suburbs of Vienna. Here he composed his oratorios, the Creation and the Seasons. The former work, the harmonies of which are pervaded with the fire of youth, was written in his sixty-fifth year, and is considered by many to be equal to the finest productions of Handel; the Seasons was almost his last work. Died, in Vienna, 1809.

Haydon, Benjamin Robert, English historical painter, was born at Plymouth, England, 1786. He exhibited his first picture at the academy in 1807, "Joseph and Mary Resting with our Saviour After a Day's Journey on the Road to Egypt." It was succeeded by "Dentatus." His great work, "Christ's Entry into Jerusalem," was exhibited in 1820, but it took some time to find a purchaser. Nothing daunted, Haydon painted two other subjects from the Passion of the Saviour. While in prison for debt he painted the "Mock Election," which George IV. purchased for 500 guineas. Of his succeeding works, "Napoleon Musing at St. Helena" has been frequently reproduced. He forsook the brush for the platform, and his lectures on art, in London and the provinces, brought him fame and, for the time being, money. He died by his own hand in 1846.

Hayes, Rutherford Birchard, nineteenth president of the United States, was born at Delaware, Ohio, 1822. He was graduated at Kenyon college and at Harvard law school, and began the practice of law at Lower Sandusky in 1845. He removed in 1849 to Cincinnati, where he was city solicitor, 1859–61. At the outbreak of the civil war he was appointed major of the 23d Ohio infantry, and shortly afterward lieutenant-colonel. He distinguished himself in the campaigns of West Virginia and in the battles around Winchester, and was severely wounded at South Mountain. In 1864 he was made brigadier-general and in 1865 brevetted major-general. He was elected to congress from Ohio, 1864–66, and was governor of that state, 1868–72 and 1876-77. He was the republican candidate for the presidency in 1876, and, after the memorable contest with Samuel J. Tilden, was inaugurated in 1877. As chief magistrate his career was marked with moderation, wisdom, and a sympathy with all true reforms. His independence of character, however, was strongly shown by his vetoes, his steady adherence to principle, and his refusal to pander to mere party politics. Died, 1893.

Hayne, Robert Young, American statesman, was born in South Carolina, 1791. He was admitted to the bar in 1812; served in the war with Great Britain; and at its close returned to his practice in Charleston. He sat in the United States senate from 1823 to 1832. He was a vigorous opponent of protection, and in 1832 boldly supported in congress the doctrine of nullification. The great debates between Daniel Webster and Hayne on the principles of the constitution, the authority of the general government, and the rights of the individual states are of unusual historical value. In November, 1832, South Carolina adopted an ordinance of nullification, in December Hayne was elected governor, and the state prepared to resist the federal power by force of arms. A compromise, however, was agreed to and the ordinance was repealed. He was mayor of Charleston, 1835–37. Died, 1840.

Hazard, Caroline, American educator, president of Wellesley college, 1899–1910, was born at Peace Dale, R. I., 1856, daughter of Rowland Hazard. She was educated by governess and tutors, at Miss Mary A. Shaw's school, Providence, and by private study abroad; A. M., university of Michigan, 1899; Litt. D., Brown, 1899; LL. D., Tufts, 1905. Author: Life of J. L. Diman; Thomas Hazard, Son of Robert; Narragansett Ballads; The Narragansett Friends' Meeting, Some Ideals in the Education of Women, etc., and essays, reviews, verses, etc., in magazines. Editor: Works of R. G. Hazard (4 vols.).

Hazlitt (hăz'-lĭt), William, English essayist and miscellaneous writer, was born in Kent, England, 1778. In 1802 he visited Paris and studied in the Louvre. On his return he attempted to support himself by portrait-painting; but as he could please neither himself nor his patrons he relinquished the easel and threw himself into literature, for which he was much better adapted. In 1803 he went to London, and shortly after published his Essay on the Principles of Human Action. In 1813 he delivered a course of lectures on the history of English philosophy, and he subsequently delivered courses on the English poets. He wrote essays in the Examiner in conjunction with Leigh Hunt, which were afterward republished in a volume entitled The Round Table. He also wrote Characters of Shakespeare's Plays; View of the Contemporary English Stage; Life of Napoleon, etc. Died, 1830.

Hearst (hûrst), Phœbe Apperson, philanthropist, was born in 1842; became a teacher. In 1862 she married George Hearst, United States senator from California, and a man of large wealth. She established and maintained kindergarten classes in San Francisco several years; also classes and a training class for kindergarten teachers in Washington, D. C., nearly ten years; now caring for about 300 children in her kindergarten classes at Lead, S. D., where her principal mining interests are located; made donations to the American university at Washington; gave $250,000 to build National Cathedral school for girls; established working girls' clubs, San Francisco; erected and equipped a mining building at university of California as a memorial to her husband; built, endowed, and gave thousands of volumes to free libraries at Lead City, South Dakota, and Anaconda, Mont., finally presenting same to the municipalities; paid cost of a competition of best architects of Europe and America for plans for greater university of California. Her other charities extend to numerous objects and institutions. She is a regent of the university of California.

Hearst, William Randolph, American newspaper publisher and politician, was born in San Francisco in 1863, son of Senator George F. and Phœbe Apperson Hearst. He was educated in the public schools of San Francisco and at Harvard. He then became editor and proprietor of the San Francisco Examiner, 1886; bought New York Journal, 1895; later bought the New York Advertiser to secure news franchise, and made it New York Morning American; started the Chicago American, 1900. In 1902 he started The Chicago Morning Examiner. In 1904 he also acquired the Boston American and the Los Angeles Examiner. He was elected to the 58th and 59th congresses from the 11th New York district, as democrat. He was candidate for mayor of New York in 1905 and 1909, and for governor in 1906. Was chief promoter of the independence league, and was responsible for making it a factor in the presidential campaign of 1908.

Heber (hē'-bĕr), Reginald, English prelate and hymn writer, was born at Malpas, Cheshire, 1783. He entered Brasenose college, Oxford, 1800, and in 1803 wrote his prize poem Palestine. Inducted into the family-living of Hodnet in Shropshire, 1807, he was a frequent contributor to the Quarterly Review, and in 1812 published a volume of Hymns. He was appointed a prebendary of St. Asaph in 1812, Bampton lecturer in 1815, and preacher of Lincoln's Inn in 1822. In 1823 he accepted the see of Calcutta; but an episcopate of apostolic zeal was terminated by his sudden death at Trichinopoly, 1826. He published sermons, A Journey Through India, etc., and edited Jeremy Taylor's Works. As a poet, his fame rests upon Palestine and his Hymns, which include "Lord of Mercy and of Might," "From Greenland's Icy Mountains," "Holy, Holy, Holy," and "The Son of God Goes Forth to War."

Hébert (ā'-bâr'), Louis Philippe, French-Canadian sculptor, was born in the province of Quebec, 1850. In early days he worked on a farm; obtained prize at provincial exhibition, Montreal, for wood-carving in 1873; afterward studied in Paris, and won prize given by Dominion government for full-length statue of George Cartier. His chief works consist of statues, among which are those to Maisonneuse and Chénier, in Montreal.

Hecker, Isaac Thomas, founder and superior of the order of Paulist fathers, was born in New York in 1819. His brothers established the well-known Hecker mills, but he was not content to labor in mercantile pursuits, and in 1843 joined the Brook Farm community in West Roxbury, Mass. Later he established a similar society at Fruitlands, Mass., then took up the study for the Episcopal ministry, but in 1845 joined the Roman Catholic church, and became a Redemptorist father. Much of his time was devoted to literature. He founded the Catholic World, organized the Catholic publication society, and wrote Questions of the Soul; Aspirations of Nature; The Church and the Age, etc. Died, 1888.

Hedin (hĕ-dēn'), Sven Anders, Swedish traveler and geographer, was born in Stockholm, 1865. He was educated at Stockholm, at Upsala, and in Germany; Ph. D., Halle. He began his explorations in Persia in 1885, and has traveled through Khôrassan and Turkestan, several times through Tibet and other parts of central Asia. His books include: Through Asia; Central Asia and Tibet; Scientific Results of a Journey in Central Asia; The Tarim River, etc.

Heine (hī'-nĕ), Heinrich, German poet and wit, was born at Düsseldorf, of Jewish parents, 1799. He abandoned Judaism, and was baptized in the Lutheran church of Heiligenstadt. He studied at Göttingen, and was graduated there in law. A visit to the Harz and to Italy supplied him with material for his Reisebilder, "Pictures of Travel." This book was a brilliant success. His Buch der Lieder — a portion of which had first appeared as Youthful Sorrows, in Berlin, 1822 — was no less fortunate. Many of these songs are of the most exquisite and etherial beauty. They are unmatched in German literature, except by the lyrics which Goethe wrote in his youth. About 1845 Heine was attacked by disease of the spine, and was almost constantly bedridden. He suffered the most acute pain, together with the loss of his sight, with the most remarkable equanimity and even good-humor, until the day of his death, which took place in Paris, 1856.

Held, Anna, comedienne, was born in Paris, 1877, daughter of Maurice Held. She was educated in an academy at Rouen, France, and married in Paris, F. Ziegfeld, Jr., of Chicago. She made her début as comedienne in Paris, 1890; since then in many rôles; began starring, 1896, in A Parlor Match; later in French Maid and Papa's Wife; Mlle. Napoleon, at the Knickerbocker theater, New York; in Parisian Model, Broadway theater, New York; in The Little Duchess, Casino theater, New York, etc.

Helmholtz (hĕlm'-hōlts), Hermann von. See page 409.

Helmont (hĕl'-mŏnt), Jan Baptista van, Belgian chemist, was born at Brussels in 1577. He filled the chair of surgery in the university of Louvain, and writers on the history of chemistry regard him as the greatest chemist who preceded Lavoisier. In 1609 he settled at Vilvorde, near Brussels, where he practiced medicine gratuitously for thirty years. He was the first to point out the imperative necessity for employing the balance in chemistry. He paid much attention to the study of the gases, and is supposed by some authorities to have been the first to apply the term gases to elastic aeriform fluids. Of these gases he distinguished several kinds. His works were published under the title Ortus Medicinæ. Died, 1644.

Helps, Sir Arthur, English essayist and historian, was born at Streatham, 1813. He was graduated at Cambridge in 1835, and on leaving the university obtained a post in the civil service. He then resigned and retired to Bishop's Waltham, in Hampshire, where, in the possession of ample means, he enjoyed lettered ease. His first work of consequence was entitled Essays written in the Intervals of Business. Among his subsequent works are Oulita, the Serf, a play; The Spanish Conquest in America; Friends in Council; Conquerors of the New World and their Bondsmen; Companions of My Solitude. Died, 1875.

Helst (hĕlst), Bartholomeus van der, Dutch painter, was born at Haarlem or Dordrecht, between 1611 and 1614. He was joint-founder in 1654 of the painters' guild of St. Luke at Amsterdam, where he attained great celebrity as a portrait-painter. His best-known work is "The Banquet of the Civic Guard," now in the Amsterdam gallery. He died in 1670.

Helvetius (hĕl-vē'-shĭ-ŭs), Claude Adrien, French philosopher, was born at Paris, 1715. In 1738 he was appointed to the lucrative office of farmer-general, and soon after became chamberlain to the queen. In 1758 appeared his celebrated work De l'Esprit, in which he endeavors to prove sensation to be the source of all intellectual activity, and that the grand lever of all human conduct is self-satisfaction. He visited England in 1764, and the year following was entertained by Frederick the Great at Potsdam. His complete works were published after his death. Died, 1771.

Hemans (hĕm'-anz), Felicia Dorothea, English poet, was born in Liverpool, 1793, daughter of George Browne, a Liverpool merchant, and became the wife of Captain Hemans. A few years after their marriage, Captain Hemans removed to Italy, and they never afterward met. Mrs. Heman's subsequent life was spent in North Wales, in Lancashire, and in Dublin. Her best poem of any length is The Forest Sanctuary; but her shorter pieces, published under the title of Songs of the Affections, etc., are by far the most popular. Many of these shorter pieces have become standard English lyrics, and upon them, almost exclusively, depends her claim to remembrance. She died in Dublin, 1835.

Henderson, Charles Richmond, American educator, sociologist, professor of sociology, university of Chicago, since 1897, was born at Covington, Ind., 1849. He was graduated at the university of Chicago, 1870; B. D., 1873, D. D., 1885, Baptist Union theological seminary; Ph. D., Leipzig, 1901. Was pastor at Terre Haute, Ind., 1873–82, Detroit, 1882–92. Associate editor of American Journal of Theology and American Journal of Sociology. Author: Introduction to Study of Dependent, Defective, and Delinquent Classes; Development of Doctrine in the Epistles; Social Spirit in America; Social Settlements; Social Elements. Edited: The Christian and Civic Economy of Large Towns; Modern Methods of Charity; Modern Prison Systems, etc.

Henderson, William James, American writer, music critic, New York Sun, since 1902, was born at Newark, N. J., 1855. He was graduated at Princeton university, 1876. On staff of New York Times, 1883–1902. Author: Story of Music; Preludes and Studies; Sea Yarns for Boys; Afloat with the Flag; Elements of Navigation; The Last Cruise of the Mohawk; What is Good Music? How Music Developed; The Orchestra and Orchestral Music; Richard Wagner; Modern Musical Drift; Pipes and Timbrels, poems; The Art of the Singer; Some Forerunners of Italian Opera. Associate editor, Standard Dictionary, 1892–94.

Hendricks, Thomas Andrews, vice-president of the United States in 1885, was born in Muskingum county, Ohio, 1819. He removed with his father to Shelby county, Ind., in 1822, graduated at Hanover college in 1841, and was admitted to the bar in 1843. He was a member of the state legislature in 1848–49, a democratic member of the house of representatives, 1851–55, and commissioner of the land office, 1855–59. He served as United States senator, 1863–69, and as governor of Indiana, 1873–77. In 1876 he was nominated for the office of vice-president of the United States by the democrats, but was defeated. In 1876, 1880, and 1884 he was a prominent candidate for the nomination for the presidency; and in 1884, when Cleveland was nominated, he consented to take the nomination for the vice-presidency and was elected. He died at Indianapolis, Ind., 1885.

Heney, Francis Joseph, lawyer, was born in Lima, N. Y., 1859, and has been a resident of San Francisco practically since 1864. He was educated at public primary, grammar and night schools, 1866–75, university of California, 1879–80, Hastings law school, 1883–84, and was admitted to the bar, 1883. He engaged in cattle business in Arizona, 1885–89; conducted Indian trader store, Fort Apache, Arizona, 1886–88; practiced law, Tucson, Arizona, 1889–95; took prominent part in litigation by which titles under Mexican land grants in Arizona were settled, and in argument of three land-grant cases before the United States supreme court; was attorney-general of Arizona, 1893-94; removed to San Francisco, 1895, and confined cases to civil business until urged by United States Attorney-General Knox to undertake land fraud cases at Portland, Ore.; discovered conspiracy of United States Attorney John H. Hall to protect guilty politicians in consideration of reappointment; secured removal and indictment of Hall, and indictment of Senator Mitchell, George C. Brownell, and others. He was then district attorney for San Francisco, but was defeated for reëlection in 1909.

Henley, William Ernest, English poet, playwright, critic, and editor, was born at Gloucester, 1849. Months of illness in Edinburgh infirmary, 1873–75, bore fruit in Hospital Rhymes, and A Book of Verses, which won much attention, and was followed by Views and Reviews; The Song of the Sword; For England's Sake; Hawthorn and Lavender, etc. He edited the Magazine of Art, the Scots Observer, and the New Review, besides an edition of Burns. He also collaborated with R. L. Stevenson in four plays, Deacon Brodie; Beau Austin; Robert Macaire, and Admiral Guinea. He died in 1903.

Hennepin (hĕn′-ē-pĭn), Louis, French priest, missionary and traveler, was born in Belgium about 1640. He served in the army as chaplain, and in 1675 went to Canada as a missionary priest. When La Salle undertook his exploration of the Mississippi valley, Father Hennepin was assigned to his command. They discovered Niagara falls, traveling west as far as Mackinac, and thence to Peoria, on the Illinois river. Here La Salle was obliged to leave the party, and Father Hennepin and two men in a canoe went down the Illinois river to its mouth, and thence north up the Mississippi, a journey of some six weeks, when they fell into the hands of a party of Sioux Indians. They discovered and named the falls of St. Anthony, near Minneapolis. Father Hennepin spent nearly a year among the Indians, and was finally rescued by Du Lhut, after whom Duluth was named. Upon his return to Europe, Hennepin published a history of his travels, which is of the greatest value in dealing with the early explorations of the Mississippi valley. Died at Utrecht about 1706.

Henry I., king of England, youngest son of William the Conqueror, was born in 1068. When his brother, William II., was found dead in the New Forest, Prince Henry at once seized the reins of government, which should have passed into the hands of his elder brother, Robert, duke of Normandy, who was at the time in Italy, on his way home from crusading in Palestine. Henry was crowned at Westminster the third day after his brother's violent death. He successfully held the crown against his brother Robert, at first negotiating with him, and granting him a pension to resign his pretensions, but finally making war against his badly governed duchy. Robert was defeated in a bloody battle before the walls of Tinchebrai in 1106, taken prisoner, and shut up in Cardiff castle during the remaining twenty-eight years of his life. The acquisition of Normandy, the ancient patrimony of his family, had been a point of ambition with Henry, but he had some trouble in keeping it, as the French king, Louis VI., and the counts of Anjou and Flanders took part with William, Robert's youthful son, whose virtues and misfortunes secured him friends. Henry, however, brought over to himself the count of Anjou; he rendered neutral, by his eloquence and fair promises, Pope Calixtus II., and defeated the French king and his mailed knights in the almost bloodless battle of Brenneville, 1119. Next year his successes in arms and intrigues were darkened for life by the death of his only son William, who was drowned at sea on his passage from Normandy to England. Henry was styled Beauclerc, or "the scholar," in honor of his learning, which, for a king in his age, was not undeserving of distinction. Died, 1135.

Henry II., king of England, grandson of Henry I., was born in 1133. His mother, Matilda, had made war against Stephen, as a usurper. In 1153, when the rival armies were drawing near each other, a treaty for compromise was set on foot, and, the only son of Stephen having died, it was agreed that Stephen should reign during his life, and that Henry should succeed him, which he did on Stephen's death the next year. He was crowned with his queen, Eleanor, who was countess of Poitou and duchess of Aquitane in her own right. Henry inherited from his father Anjou, Touraine, and Maine, and his father and mother succeeded in keeping and taking possession of Normandy for themselves and him; so that, by one method and another, he came to be possessed of a large portion of France as well as England. His chief rivals in power were the clergy. To aid him in reducing the church to subjection to the civil power he appointed his trusted chancellor, Thomas à Becket, to the see of Canterbury, and compelled him and the other ecclesiastics to agree to the constitutions of Clarendon. Becket, however, proved to be a true churchman, and the long and obstinate struggle between him and his monarch was only terminated by his murder. Henry did penance at his grave, allowing himself to be scourged by monks; and he was ultimately successful in reducing the church to subordination in civil matters. During his reign occurred the conquest of Ireland. This was a nominal conquest, for the majority of the Irish tribes and chieftains continued to be independent barbarians for centuries. Henry's sons, incited by their jealous mother, Queen Eleanor, rebelled against him, and their cause was espoused by the kings of France and Scotland. In the course of this filial rebellion Henry, the eldest, died of a fever, and Geoffrey was killed in a tournament at Paris. Richard, surnamed Cœur de Lion, with King Philip of France, obtained some advantages over his father. A treaty of peace was concluded between them, of which one of the stipulations was for an indemnity for all the followers of Richard. Died, 1189.

Henry III., king of England, grandson of Henry II., and eldest son of King John, was born in 1207. He came to the throne in 1216 when a minor, and in the course of a long reign provoked much hostility by his foreign favorites and his submission to papal exactions. This discontent culminated in the barons' war, 1262–65, in which he was defeated and compelled to submit to control of the government by De Montfort and his friends. These, however, quarreled among themselves, and at Evesham De Montfort was defeated and slain. During this reign the great charter (with important clauses omitted) was frequently renewed, and Westminster abbey was almost entirely built. Died, 1272.

Henry IV., king of England, first king of the house of Lancaster, was born in 1367, and surnamed Bolingbroke, from his birthplace. About 1380 he was made earl of Derby, and married Mary de Bohun. He led a roving life for some years, was present at the taking of Tunis in 1390, fought against the heathen on the shores of the Baltic, and made an attempt to reach Jerusalem. In 1397 he supported Richard II. against Gloucester, and the following year was banished.

Upon the death of his father, his estates were forfeited. In July, 1399, he landed in York with three small vessels, and on September 29th he obtained from Richard, then a prisoner in the Tower, an abandonment of his claims to the throne. On the next day, Henry arose in parliament and claimed kingdom and crown. His reign proved one of trouble, disorder, and rebellion. Poverty and heavy taxes oppressed the people, and Henry's dependency on the wealth of the church caused him to allow severe laws against heretics to be made. In 1412 he sent two expeditions into France, but in his closing years he was afflicted with epileptic fits, in one of which he died at Westminster, 1413.

Henry V., king of England, was born at Monmouth, 1387, eldest son of Henry IV. by Mary de Bohun. From 1401 to 1408 he was engaged against Glendower and the Welsh rebels; in 1409 he became constable of Dover, and in 1410 captain of Calais. He was crowned in 1413, and at the outset of his reign liberated the young earl of March, the true heir to the crown, restored Hotspur's son to his father's lands and honors, and had Richard II.'s body buried in Westminster. The great effort of his reign was an attempted conquest of France; and in 1414 he demanded the French crown, to which he seems to have believed that he had a valid claim through his great-grandfather, Edward III. In 1415 he sailed with an army of 30,000 men, and in September took Harfleur. In October, at Agincourt, he gained a battle against such odds as to make his victory one of the most notable in history. Two years after he again invaded France, and by the end of 1418 Normandy was once more subject to the English crown. In 1420 was concluded the "perpetual peace" of Troyes, under which Henry was recognized as regent and "heir of France," and married the French king's daughter, Catharine of Valois. In 1421 he took his young queen to England to be crowned; but in a month he was recalled by news of the defeat at Beaugé of his brother, the duke of Clarence. Henry's wonted success was attending him, when he was seized with illness, and died at Vincennes, 1422, leaving an infant to succeed him.

Henry VII., king of England, was born about 1457, first of the Tudor dynasty. He was the son of Edmund Tudor and Margaret Beaufort, a descendant of John of Gaunt. He invaded England in 1485, and defeated Richard III. at Bosworth, after which he married Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV. His reign was marked by three Yorkist risings, which he defeated, by the measures he enforced against the nobles, by his system of marriages with foreign princes, and the enactment of Poyning's law. Died, 1509.

Henry VIII., king of England, second son of Henry VII. and Elizabeth of York, was born in 1491. Betrothed at twelve, he was married in 1509, shortly after his succession, to Catharine of Aragon, his brother's widow, six years his senior. Handsome, generous, and full of life, the king was a favorite with all classes. He chose his ministers wisely, and, leaving much to their discretion, nevertheless held the reins of government himself. Wolsey, archbishop of York, his chief minister, held almost unlimited power, dependent, however, on the king's will and favor. Wars with France and Scotland in 1513 brought victory to England at Terouenne and Tourney, and at Flodden. From this date until 1529 Henry was engrossed much in foreign affairs, wars in France, and the failure of the attempt to collect war loans in England. In 1521 Henry gained from the pope the title "defender of the faith," still borne by the English sovereign, for his Assertio Septem Sacramentorum against Luther. The appearance at court of Anne Boleyn, and the failure of a male heir, encouraged Henry to raise the old question as to the legality of the marriage with Catharine. Wolsey zealously aided him, seeing in a divorce the possibility of a breaking of ties with Charles V. and an alliance with France. The appeal to the pope in 1527 resulted only in the appointment of a commission. Henry, angered at Wolsey's apparent failure, took away his office, and installed Thomas Cromwell as minister and Cranmer as archbishop of Canterbury, with Sir Thomas More as chancellor. Parliament was called in 1529, and passed a number of acts abrogating the papal power in England, heavily fining the clergy, and finally recognizing Henry as supreme head of the church of England, the clergy acknowledging his authority to secure a partial remittance of the fines. In 1531 Cromwell succeeded More as chancellor. In 1533 Henry, impatient at the delay, was privately married to Anne, with whom he had long been living; three months later the marriage was announced, and Cranmer, calling a court, as the highest ecclesiastical authority in England, pronounced the divorce from Catharine and declared the marriage null and void from the beginning. A year later Clement decided in favor of Catharine, but not until Henry had severed all connections with Rome, by making it treason to deny his authority as head of the church of England. In quick succession came the translation of the Bible, its introduction into every church, the act of uniformity, and the ten articles of faith, later changed again to six articles, embodying substantially the old creed, with the penalty of death for denial. In 1536 Henry charged Anne Boleyn with infidelity, sent her to the block and married Jane Seymour, by whom he had a son, Edward VI. She died in 1537 and three years later he married Anne of Cleves, at Cromwell's suggestion. She proved far from handsome, was divorced, and Cromwell sent to the block. On the day of his execution Henry married Catharine Howard, but she was soon found unfaithful, and beheaded. In 1543 Henry married Catharine Parr, who survived him. He died, 1547.

Henry II., king of France, was born in 1519, son of Francis I., whom he succeeded in 1547. By his alliance with the German Protestants, he acquired Metz, Toul, and Verdun, carried on his father's war with Spain, was defeated at St. Quentin in 1557, but in 1558 he regained Calais from the English. He died in 1559 of a wound inflicted in a tournament held to celebrate the conclusion of the war by the marriage of his daughter and Philip II. of Spain.

Henry III., king of France, third son of Henry II. and Catharine de' Medici, was born in 1551. In 1569 he gained victories over the Protestants at Jarnac and Moncontour, and he took an active share in the massacre of St. Bartholomew. In 1573 the intrigues of the queen-regent secured his election to the crown of Poland; but in 1574 he succeeded his brother, Charles IX., on the French throne. His reign was a period of almost incessant civil war between Huguenots and Catholics, the duke of Guise having formed the holy league to assert the supremacy of Catholicism and secure the reversion of the throne to the Guises. Henry showed fickleness and want of courage in his public conduct; and in private his life was spent in an alternation of dissolute excesses and wild outbreaks of religious fanaticism. In 1588 the assassination of the duke of Guise roused the Catholics to the utmost pitch of exasperation; Henry threw himself into the arms of Henry of Navarre, and the two marched upon Paris at the head of a Huguenot army. But in August, 1589, Henry was stabbed by a fanatical Dominican named Jacques Clément; he died, the last of the house of Valois, on the following day, nominating Henry of Navarre as his successor.

Henry IV., king of France, was born in 1553, son of Anthony of Navarre, a descendant of Louis IX. He was founder of the Bourbon dynasty, succeeding Henry III. in 1589. His marriage with Marguerite de Valois, in 1572, was the occasion of the Bartholomew massacre. In 1576 he quitted the court and became leader of the Huguenots and opponent of the league, being the rival of the Guises for the succession. He defeated them at Arques and Ivry, but was unable to conquer Paris without becoming a Roman Catholic, which he did in 1593. He concluded peace with Philip II. at Vervins, and issued the edict of Nantes. The rest of his reign was occupied by domestic reforms. He was assassinated by Ravaillac, 1610.

Henry IV., emperor of the holy Roman empire, was born at Goslar, Prussia, 1050, son of Henry III. He was crowned emperor in 1084 by Clement III. The chief occurrence of his reign was the struggle with Gregory VII., with whom he began the investiture disputes. During this celebrated controversy he deposed Gregory, but was himself excommunicated and deposed, and was obliged to submit at Canossa in 1077. In 1084 he again invaded Italy, and captured Rome. In Germany he had enemies in Rudolf of Swabia (whom he defeated finally at Wolksheim in 1080), in the Saxons, and in his sons, Conrad and Henry, by the latter of whom he was dethroned. Died, 1106.

Henry, Joseph, American physicist, was born in Albany, N. Y., 1797; was appointed professor of natural philosophy in the college of New Jersey at Princeton, 1832; and, in 1846, was called to the office of secretary or director of the Smithsonian institution at Washington, to the organization and wide reputation of which he had mostly contributed. Henry made most important discoveries in electro-magnetism, and disputed with Morse the invention of the electric telegraph. Died, 1878.

Henry, Patrick, American orator and statesman, was born in Virginia in 1736. After receiving a common school education, and spending some time in trade and agriculture, he commenced the practice of law, after only six weeks of preparatory study. In spite of several years of poverty, he first rose to distinction in managing the popular cause in the controversy between the legislature and the clergy, touching the stipend which was claimed by the latter. In 1765 he was elected a member of the Virginia house of burgesses, with express reference to an opposition to the British stamp act. In this assembly he obtained the honor of being the first to commence the opposition to the measures of the British government, which terminated in the revolution. He was one of the delegates sent by Virginia to the first general congress of the colonies, in 1774, and in that body distinguished himself by his boldness and eloquence. In 1776 he was appointed the first governor of the commonwealth, and to this office was repeatedly reëlected. In 1786 he was appointed by the legislature one of the deputies to the convention held at Philadelphia, for the purpose of revising the federal constitution. In 1788 he was a member of the convention which met in Virginia to consider the constitution of the United States, and exerted himself strenuously against its adoption. In 1794 he retired from the bar, and died in 1799. Without extensive information upon legal or political topics, he was a natural orator of the highest order, possessing great powers of imagination, sarcasm, and humor, united with great force and energy of manner, and a deep knowledge of human nature.

Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony and Bavaria, was born in 1129. He was the son of Henry the Proud, a rebellious noble who had been deprived of his estates by Conrad III. On the death of Conrad these dukedoms were restored to Henry the Lion, who became the greatest of all the German princes. Great improvements were made by him in his dominions, and he became so powerful as to determine to be no longer a subject even to the emperor. At the battle of Legnano he caused the emperor Frederick Barbarossa to be defeated by withdrawing his troops from the field. Frederick for this took away his estates, and banished him for three years to England. Died, 1195.

Henry the Navigator, son of João I., king of Portugal, and the English Philippa, daughter of John of Gaunt, was born in 1394. He distinguished himself at the capture of Ceuta in 1415; took up his residence at Sagres, in Algarve; and during the war against the Moors his sailors reached parts of the ocean before unknown. He erected an observatory and a school for navigation, and despatched some of his pupils on voyages of discovery, resulting in the discovery of the Madeira islands in 1419. Henry's thoughts were now directed toward the gold-producing coasts of Guinea; and in 1434 one of his mariners sailed round Cape Nun, and touched Cape Bojador. Next year another expedition reached a point 120 miles beyond Cape Bojador; in 1441 Cape Blanco was reached. Up to this period the prince had borne the expense of these voyages himself; henceforth societies for the purpose were formed under his guidance. In 1445 Henry's captain, Nuno Tristam, doubled Cape Verde, and in 1448 Gonzalez Vallo discovered three of the Azores. Henry died in 1460, after his mariners had reached Sierra Leone.

Henson, Herbert Hensley, canon of Westminster abbey and rector of St. Margaret's since 1900; sub-dean of Westminster since 1911; was born in London, England, 1863. He was educated privately and at Oxford; was a fellow of All Souls college, Oxford, 1884–91, reëlected, 1896; B. D., 1898; hon. D. D., Glasgow, 1906. Head of the Oxford house, Bethnal Green, 1887-88; vicar of Barking, Essex, 1888–95; select preacher at Oxford, 1895-96, Cambridge, 1901; incumbent of St. Mary's hospital, Ilford, 1895–1900; chaplain to lord bishop of St. Alban's, 1897–1900. Hepburn, Alonzo Barton, banker, was born at Colton, N. Y., 1846. He was graduated at Middlebury college, Vermont, 1871, LL. D., 1894; D. C. L., St. Lawrence university, 1906. He was instructor in mathematics, St. Lawrence academy; principal Ogdensburg educational institute; practiced law at Colton; member New York assembly, 1875–80; superintendent banking department, New York, 1880–92; comptroller of the currency, 1892-93; president Third national bank, New York city, 1893–97; vice-president National city bank, 1897–99; president Chase national bank, 1899-1911, chairman board of directors since 1911. He is also a director in the New York life insurance company, Bankers trust company, Columbia trust company, Maryland trust company (Baltimore), Safety car heating and lighting company, Union typewriter company, United cigar manufacturers company, Sears, Roebuck and Company (Chicago), etc. Author of History of Coinage and Currency, and frequent contributor to reviews and magazines.

Hepburn, James Curtis, American physician and medical missionary, was born at Milton, Pa., 1815. He graduated at Princeton college, 1832; university of Pennsylvania medical department, M. D., 1836; LL. D., Lafayette, 1872, Princeton, 1905. Went to China as medical missionary, 1840; stationed in Singapore, 1841–43, in Amoy, China, 1843–46; returned to United States, 1846; resided in New York, 1846–59; went to Japan, 1859; lived in Yokohama until 1892; returned to United States, 1893, and retired. He compiled first English dictionary of Japanese language; published an English-Japanese Dictionary; wrote a grammar of the Japanese language; translated the Bible into the Japanese language, 1872–88, and published a Japanese Dictionary of the Bible, 1891. Died, 1911.

Hepburn, William Peters, lawyer, ex-congressman, was born in Wellsville, Ohio, 1833. His parents removed to Iowa in 1841, where he was educated in local schools and in a printing office. He was admitted to the bar in 1854; in the Union army, 1861–65, as a captain, major, and lieutenant-colonel, 2d Iowa cavalry; was presidential elector, 1876 and 1888; member of congress, 1881–87, and 1893–1909 from the 8th Iowa district. While a member of congress he was chairman of committee on interstate and foreign commerce, and author of the Hepburn bill to regulate interstate commerce. He was regarded as the ablest debater in the lower house for many years.

Heraclius (hĕr-ȧ-klī′-ŭs), Byzantine emperor, was born in Cappadocia about 575. In 610 he headed a revolt against Phocas, slew him, and mounted his throne. At this time the Avars threatened the empire on the northwest, and the Persians invaded it. Chosroes II. captured Damascus in 613, and in 614, Jerusalem; then all Syria, Egypt, and Asia Minor were conquered. At length Heraclius, having in 620 concluded a treaty with the Avars, in 622 took the field against the Persians, routed them in a series of brilliant campaigns, won back his lost provinces, and shut up Chosroes in Ctesiphon, 628. But soon the followers of Mohammed won from Heraclius nearly all he gained from the Persians, he meanwhile wasting his time in self-indulgence and theological disputes. Died, 641.

Herbart (hĕr′-bärt), Johann Friedrich, German philosopher, was born at Oldenburg, Germany, 1776. At a very early age he was familiar with religious and metaphysical doctrines and discussions, and at twelve years had read the systems of Wolff and Kant. He then studied at Jena, became the pupil of Fichte, and received his philosophy with enthusiasm; but after more reflection he found himself obliged to reject much of his system, and to form one of his own. In 1805 he was appointed professor at Göttingen, and in 1809 obtained the chair of philosophy at Königsberg. In 1833 he returned to Göttingen, where he remained until death. His collected works were published by his scholar, Hartenstein, 1850–52. Died, 1841.

Herbert, George, English poet, was born in Montgomery castle, Wales, 1593. His oldest brother was Lord Herbert of Cherbury. From Westminster he passed in 1609 to Trinity college, Cambridge, in 1615 was elected a fellow, and was public orator, 1619–27. He looked for advancement at court, but, by the gift of a prebend of Lincoln and the friendship of Nicholas Ferrar, he was drawn toward a religious life, and in 1630 was presented to the vicarage of Bemerton near Salisbury. He held it only three years, when he died in 1633. His Country Parson is generally considered to be a picture of himself; The Temple, or Sacred Poems and Private Ejaculations contains some of the purest pious verse in the English language.

Herbert, Victor, conductor, composer, was born in Dublin, Ireland, 1859. He began his musical education in Germany at the age of seven, studying under leading masters, and gained his first position of prominence as principal violoncello player in court orchestra, Stuttgart. He was also heard in concerts throughout Europe before coming to the United States as solo violoncellist in Metropolitan orchestra, New York, 1886. Subsequently he was connected with Theodore Thomas's, Seidl's, and other orchestral organizations as soloist and conductor. Bandmaster of 22d regiment band, New York, since 1894; conductor of Pittsburgh, Pa., orchestra, 1898–1904; Victor Herbert's New York orchestra, since 1904. Composer: The Captive, an oratorio; Prince Ananias; The Wizard of the Nile; The Serenade; Cyrano de Bergerac; The Ameer; The Viceroy; The Idol's Eye; The Fortune Teller; The Singing Girl; Babette; Babes in Toyland; It Happened in Nordland, etc., all comic operas. He has also written several compositions for orchestra, songs, and a concert for violoncello and orchestra.

Herder (hĕr′-dẽr), Johann Gottfried von, German critic and poet, was born at Mohrungen in East Prussia, 1744. He studied at Königsberg, and there became acquainted with Kant and Hamann. In 1764 he became teacher in a school and assistant-pastor of a church at Riga. Between 1766 and 1769 he wrote two works, in which he maintained that the truest poetry is the poetry of the people. In 1769 he made the acquaintance of Goethe at Strassburg; in 1770 was appointed court-preacher at Bückeburg, and in 1776 first preacher in Weimar. In 1802 he was ennobled by the elector of Bavaria. He wrote many important works, among them: Fragments of the more Modern German Literature; Origin of Language; The Oldest Record of the Human Race; Folk-Songs; Voices of the Nations in Songs; Letters for the Advancement of Humanity, etc. He died at Weimar, 1803.

Herkimer (hûr′-kĭ-mẽr), Nicholas, American general, was born about 1715. In 1758 he was appointed a lieutenant of militia, and commanded Fort Herkimer at the time the French and Indians attacked German Flats. Later Herkimer lived in the Conajoharie district, where in 1775 he was made colonel of militia and chairman of the committee of safety. In 1776 he attained the rank of brigadier-general. In the next year, when Colonel St. Leger, sent out by General Burgoyne, was besieging Fort Schuyler, Herkimer, with 800 militia, marched to its relief, and led an expedition against a British force of tories and Indians. In this movement he fell into an ambuscade at Oriskany in August, 1777. Herkimer's horse was killed, and he himself fatally wounded.

Herkomer (hûr′-kō-mẽr), Hubert von, English artist, was born in Waal, Bavaria, 1849. His father, Lorenzo Herkomer, a skillful wood-carver, emigrated with his family to the United States, 1851, but in 1857 removed to England and settled in Southampton. At the age of thirteen Herkomer entered the art school at Southampton, and won a bronze medal there. He then studied at Munich, established himself in the village of Hythe, and there painted two pictures, which he exhibited at the Dudley gallery. He finally removed to London, where he occupied himself successfully with water-color painting and designing for wood engravings. Subsequently he turned his attention to etching and other branches of practice. His later pictures include: "At Death's Door"; "Der Bittgang"; "Eventide"; "A Scene in the Westminster Union"; "A Welshwoman", "Souvenir de Rembrandt"; "The Last Muster," etc. He became a member of the royal academy, an honorary member of the imperial academy of Vienna, and succeeded Ruskin as Slade professor of art at Oxford, 1885–94.

Hermes (hĕr'-mās), Georg, Roman Catholic philosopher, was born at Dreyerwalde in Westphalia, 1775. He became theological professor at Münster in 1807, and in 1819 at Bonn. In his Die Innere Wahrheit des Christentums, Philosophische Einleitung in die Christkatholische Theologie, and Christkatholische Dogmatik, he sought to base the Catholic faith and doctrines on a critical theory of knowledge like Kant's. The Hermesian method departed widely from the old text-books of the schools; and although his substantial orthodoxy was not questioned, his doctrines were condemned by a papal brief in 1835 as heretical, and his followers were deprived of their chairs. Died, 1831.

Herne (hûrn), James A., American actor and dramatist, was born at Troy, N. Y., 1840. He appeared chiefly in his own plays, chief of which are: Hearts of Oak; Margaret Fleming; Shore Acres; Rev. Griffith Davenport; Sag Harbor. He was an actor of great ability and a skillful stage manager. Died, 1901.

Herod (hĕr'-ŭd) the Great, king of Judæa, was born at Askalon, 62 B. C., became governor of Galilee about 47, and through the influence of Mark Antony ascended the throne of Judæa in 40. During his reign occurred the birth of the Messiah, and the consequent massacre of the innocents. Herod was so cruel by nature that for deeds of blood and violence his name became a proverb. Died, 4 B. C.

Herodotus (hē-rŏd'-ō-tŭs). See page 16.

Herrera (ĕr-rā'-rā), Antonio de, Spanish historian, was born at Cuellar near Segovia, 1549. Philip II. made him chief chronicler of America, and historian of Castile, which offices he filled for many years. He wrote a history of Castilian Exploits in the Pacific, a description of the West Indies, a history of England and Scotland in the time of Mary Stuart, etc. Died, 1625.

Herrera, Fernando de, Spanish lyric poet, was born at Seville about 1534, and took orders in the church. Many of his love-poems are remarkable for tender feeling, while his odes display a lofty enthusiasm. He wrote a prose history of the war in Cyprus, and translated from the Latin of Stapleton a Life of Sir Thomas More. Died, 1597.

Herrera, Francisco, "the elder," Spanish painter, was born in Seville, 1576. He painted historical pieces, wine-shops, fairs, carnivals, and scenes from the life of the people, and was one of the most eminent Spanish painters of the school of Seville. His "Last Judgment" is a masterpiece of drawing and coloring; and his "Holy Family" and "Outpouring of the Holy Spirit" are also much esteemed. The cupola of the church at St. Bonaventure displays his skill in fresco-painting. Some of his best works are in the Louvre at Paris. Died, 1656.

Herrick, Myron T., financier, ex-governor of Ohio, was born at Huntington, Ohio, 1854. He was educated in the district schools in Ohio, at Oberlin college, and Ohio Wesleyan university; was admitted to the bar, Cleveland, 1878. He retired from law practice, 1886, to become secretary and treasurer of the society for savings, Cleveland, of which he has been president since 1894; also chairman of board Wheeling and Lake Erie railroad; officer or director in numerous other railway and financial enterprises. From 1903 to 1906 he was governor of Ohio, and has since been influential in the politics of the state. Appointed ambassador to France, 1912.

Herrick, Robert, English poet, was born in Cheapside, London, 1591, son of a goldsmith. He was educated at St. John's college and at Trinity hall, Cambridge. After taking orders as a clergyman of the church of England, he was presented by Charles I. to the vicarage of Dean Prior. After about twenty years' residence, his living was sequestered in the civil war, and, rejoicing in his freedom from the "rude salvages" of Devon, he went to reside in Westminster. After the restoration he was replaced in his vicarage, where he died in 1674. In 1648 he published his celebrated collection of lyrical poems, entitled Hesperides, or the Works both Human and Divine of Robert Herrick, Esq. About the same time he published Noble Numbers, or Pious Pieces. His poems, not fewer than thirteen hundred in number, include some of the finest lyrical pieces in the language.

Herrick, Robert, educator, novelist, was born at Cambridge, Mass., 1868. He was graduated at Harvard, 1890; was instructor in rhetoric, Massachusetts institute of technology, 1890–93; instructor in rhetoric, 1893–95, assistant professor, 1895–1901, associate professor, 1901–05, professor English since 1905, university of Chicago. Author: The Man who Wins; Literary Love Letters and other Stories; The Gospel of Freedom; Love's Dilemmas; Composition and Rhetoric (with Professor L. T. Damon); The Web of Life; The Real World; Their Child; The Common Lot; The Memoirs of an American Citizen, etc.

Herschel (hûr'-shel), Caroline Lucretia, sister of the astronomer, Sir (Frederick) William Herschel, was born in Hanover, 1750. When William was appointed astronomer to George III. she acted as his assistant, and in that character received a small salary from the king. She discovered seven comets, for five of which she has the credit of priority of discovery. Several remarkable nebulæ and clusters of stars included in her brother's catalogues were described from her original observations. In 1798 she published, with an introduction by her brother, A Catalogue of Stars taken from Mr. Flamsteed's Observations, etc. This valuable work was published at the expense of the royal society, and contained 561 stars omitted in the British catalogue. She was made an honorary member of the royal society, and died in 1848.

Herschel, Sir John Frederick William, English astronomer, son of Sir (Frederick) William Herschel, was born in 1792. About 1825 he began his observations in sidereal astronomy, to which he chiefly devoted himself. His great enterprise was his expedition toward the close of 1833 to the cape of Good Hope to take observations of the southern firmament. In 1847 appeared his Results of Astronomical Observations at the Cape of Good Hope, one of the most valuable works of our time. His residence at the cape gave not only valuable additions to astronomy, but also to meteorology. His observations on the milky way, on the brightness and the color of stars, on variable stars, on the sun's rays, on the atmospheric air, and on the Magellanic clouds, are all very valuable. He also made valuable researches in light, sound, and celestial physics. His best known work is Outlines of Astronomy. Died, 1871.

Herschel, Sir (Frederick) William, German-English astronomer, was born in Hanover, 1738. He was educated specially as a professional musician. In 1757 he went to England, where he became a teacher of music in the town of Leeds, from which he went to Halifax as organist, and subsequently in the same capacity to Bath. Here he turned his attention to astronomy. Wanting a telescope, and unable to afford a reflector, he made one for himself. In 1781 he discovered the planet Uranus, which discovery resulted in his appointment as private astronomer to George III., with a salary of 200 pounds a year. He was knighted by George III., and made a D. C. L. by the university of Oxford. He contributed sixty-nine papers to the Philosophical Transactions, and to vol. i., Memoirs of the Astronomical Society, he contributed a paper On the Places of 145 New Double Stars. He greatly added to our knowledge of the solar system; discovered six satellites of Uranus, and two satellites of Saturn; detected the rotation of Saturn's rings, the period of rotation of Saturn itself, and the existence of the motion of binary stars, the first revelation of systems besides our own. He threw new light on the milky way and the constitution of nebulæ, and, in fact, was the first to give the human mind a proper conception of the immensity of the universe. He erected a monster telescope, as it was then considered, of forty feet focal length. It was begun in 1785 and finished in 1789. Died, 1822.

Hertz (hĕrts), Henrik, Danish poet and dramatist, was born in Copenhagen, 1798. He was of Jewish descent, was educated at the university of Copenhagen, traveled abroad, and returned as a professor of the university. His first important work was Letters of a Ghost, a rhymed satirical poem. His subsequent works include: Amor's Clever Pranks; Emma; The Only Error; King René's Daughter; Svend Dyring's House; The Saving's Bank; Love and Politics; The Heirs, etc. Died, 1870.

Hervieu (ĕr'-vyû'), Paul Ernest, French author and dramatist, was born at Neuilly-sur-Seine, 1857. He was educated at the Lycée Condorcet, Paris, and at the École de Droit; was admitted as an advocate, 1877. In 1900 he was elected to the French academy. He has written several novels, but his most notable achievements are his dramas, which are marked by keen observation of life and delicate fancy.

Herzog (hĕr'-tsōᴋ), Johann Jakob, German theologian, was born at Basel, 1805. He became professor at Lausanne, 1830, at Halle, 1847, and Erlangen, 1854. He wrote books on the Plymouth brethren and the Waldenses, lives of Calvin and Œcolampadius, a church-history, etc., and edited the great Realencyklopädie für Protestantische Theologie und Kirche (22 vols.). Died, 1882.

Hesiod (hē'-sĭ-ŏd), one of the earliest Greek poets, was born in Bœotia, lived in the eighth century B. C., chiefly at Orchomenus, probably of humble birth. Of the works ascribed to him the principal were the Works and Days, the Theogony, and the Shield of Hercules. His poems treat of the quiet pursuits of ordinary life, the origin of the world, the gods and heroes, while those of Homer are occupied with the restless and active enterprises of the heroic age.

Hewlett, Maurice Henry, English historical writer and novelist, was born at London, 1861. He was educated at the London international college, at Spring Grove, Isleworth; was admitted as a barrister, 1891. Author: Earthwork out of Tuscany; The Masque of Dead Florentines; Songs and Meditations; The Forest Lovers; Pan and the Young Shepherd; Little Novels of Italy; Richard Yea-and-Nay; New Canterbury Tales; The Queen's Quair; The Road in Tuscany; Fond Adventures; The Fool Errant; The Stooping Lady; Half-way House, etc.

Heyburn, Weldon Brinton, United States senator, lawyer, was born in Delaware county, Pa., 1852. He received an academic education, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1876. He removed to Shoshone county, Idaho, 1883, and practiced there. He was a delegate to republican national conventions, 1888, 1892, 1900; was republican nominee for congress, 1898, but was defeated; elected United States senator from Idaho for term, 1903–09, and reëlected for term, 1909–15. Died, 1912.

Heyne (hī'-nĕ), Christian Gottlob, German classical scholar, was born in Saxony, 1729. In 1753 he obtained the situation of under-clerk in the Brühl library at Dresden. While there he prepared his edition of Tibullus, which appeared in 1755. In 1756, unfortunately for Heyne, the seven years' war broke out. Frederick the Great marched against Dresden, and burned, among other things, the Brühl library, but not before Heyne had edited, from a codex there, the Enchiridion of Epictetus. In 1763, following the death of Gesner, professor of rhetoric at Göttingen, Heyne was appointed his successor. Among his other works were editions of Virgil, Pindar, Apollodorus, and Homer's Iliad; six volumes of Opuscula Academica; and 7,500 reviews of books in the Göttinger Gelehrte Anzeigen. Died, 1812.

Heyse (hī'-zĕ), Paul Johann, German poet, dramatist, and novelist, was born in Berlin, 1830. He was educated at Berlin and Bonn, and settled at Munich in 1854. He has published collections of novelettes, good specimens of which are contained in Das Buch der Freundschaft. His poetic works include narrative poems, such as Urica, and epics, Die Braut von Cypern and Thekla. As a dramatist he has been almost as copious as a novelist, but few of his pieces have been unequivocally successful. His more recent successful novels are Die Kinder der Welt, Im Paradiese, Merlin, etc. Received Nobel prize for literature, 1910.

Hezekiah, king of Judah, son and successor of Ahaz, reigned from 726 to 696 B. C. There was "none like him among all the kings of Judah" is the praise bestowed upon him in the book of Kings. His efforts seem chiefly to have been directed toward the abolition of the idolatry which reigned paramount in the land, and the restoration of the worship of Jehovah to its pristine purity and glory. At the head of a repentant and united people Hezekiah returned to assume the aggressive against the Philistines, and in a series of victories not only re-won the cities his father had lost, but captured others. At length Sennacherib with a mighty host advanced against Jerusalem, but by some catastrophe 180,000 men in the Assyrian camp were killed in a single night, and Sennacherib was obliged to retreat. A second Assyrian invasion, however, under Merodach-baladan resulted in the captivity and the end of Hezekiah's rule.

Hicks, Elias, American Quaker preacher, was born at Hempstead, L. I., 1748. At twenty-seven he was a well-known and influential Quaker preacher, and for many years traveled through the United States and Canada. He exercised great influence among his co-religionists until his Unitarianism brought him into disfavor with orthodox Friends; but he defended his views with perseverance, and at eighty he still preached. The result was a schism of the society into two divisions, known as orthodox and Hicksite Friends. He was a vigorous abolitionist. Died, 1830.

Hicks-Beach, Sir Michael Edward, English statesman, made in the year 1906 Viscount St. Aldwyn, was born in London, 1837. He was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford; succeeded his father as ninth baronet in 1854; in 1864 became conservative member of parliament for East Gloucestershire, and in 1885 for West Bristol. He was chief-secretary for Ireland, 1874–78 and 1886–87; colonial secretary, 1878–80, and chancellor of the exchequer, 1885-86 — an office he held again in 1895–1902.

Hiero (hī'-ĕ-rō) I., king of Syracuse, succeeded his brother Gelon in 478 B. C. The most important event of his reign was the naval victory gained by his fleet and that of the Cumani over the Etruscans in 474, which deprived the latter of their supremacy in the Tyrrhenian sea. Though violent and rapacious, he was a lover of poetry, and the patron of Simonides, Æschylus, Bacchylides, and Pindar. He died at Catania in 467 B. C.

Hiero II., king of Syracuse, 269–216 B. C., was the son of a noble Syracusan named Hierocles. He came to the front during the troubles in Sicily after the retreat of Pyrrhus, 275 B. C. He joined the Carthaginians in besieging Messana, which had surrendered to the Romans; but was beaten by Appius Claudius. In 263 he concluded a fifteen years' peace with Rome, and in 248 a permanent one. In the second Punic war Hiero supported the Romans with money and troops. He was a patron of the arts, and Archimedes was his relative and friend. Died, 216.

Higginson, Ella, author, was born at Council Grove, Kansas, in 1862, daughter of Charles Reeves Rhoads. She was educated at Oregon City seminary and in a private school; married Russell Carden Higginson, New York. Author: The Flower that Grew in the Sand, From the Land of the Snow Pearls, A Forest Orchid, all books of short stories; When the Birds Go North Again, poems; The Snow Pearls, a poem; Mariella, of Out-West, a novel; The Voice of April-Land, poems; also The Takin' In of Old Mis' Lane, which won McClure's $500 prize for best short story. She also conducts the literary department of the Seattle Sunday Times.

Higginson, Henry Lee, banker, was born in New York, 1834. He entered Harvard in 1851, but did not complete course. He became an employee in the counting-house of S. and E. Austin, Boston; then went to Vienna; studied music; served in United States volunteers in civil war, becoming major and brevetted lieutenant-colonel of 1st Massachusetts cavalry, and was severely wounded at Aldie, Va., June, 1863. He later entered the firm of Lee, Higginson and Company, bankers, Boston. He has devoted a considerable sum to organization of the symphony orchestra in Boston, and has dispensed numerous other philanthropies.

Higginson, Thomas Wentworth, American writer, was born in Cambridge, Mass., 1823. He graduated at Harvard, 1841; LL. D., Harvard, Western Reserve university. After several years in the ministry he entered keenly into the movement against slavery; took part in the civil war as captain of the 51st Massachusetts volunteer militia, later colonel 1st South Carolina (Union) volunteers, and afterward of the 33d United States colored troops. Hill, Sir Rowland, originator of penny postage, was born at Kidderminster, England, 1795, and was a teacher from an early age down to 1833. He was one of the founders of the society for the diffusion of useful knowledge, 1826, interested himself in the socialistic schemes of Robert Owen, and took an active share in the colonization of South Australia. Sensible of the urgent need for reducing the high rates of postage, he advocated, in 1837, an adhesive postage stamp and a low and uniform rate between all places in the British isles in a pamphlet, Post-office Reform. Two years later Hill was attached to the treasury for the purpose of putting his projected reforms into execution; and in 1840 the present uniform penny rate came into force. In 1841 the conservative government, which had opposed the reduction, came into office, and in 1842 Hill was dismissed. Four years later a sum of 13,000 pounds, raised by public subscription, was presented to him; and the liberals, returning to power, made Hill secretary to the postmaster-general, and in 1854 secretary to the post-office. In 1864 he resigned owing to ill-health, and was awarded a pension of 2,000 pounds for life, together with a parliamentary grant of 20,000 pounds. He died at Hampstead in 1879, and was buried in Westminster abbey.

Hofer (hō'-fĕr), Andreas, Tyrolese patriot, was born at St. Leonard, 1767. In 1796 he led a body of Tyrolese against the French on the lake of Garda; in 1808 secret deputies, among whom was Hofer, arrived at Vienna, to represent to the archduke John the sufferings of the people, and their wish to be reunited to Austria. By the desire of the archduke, Baron von Hormayr sketched for them a plan of insurrection, which met with such success that, in three days, from the 11th to the 13th of April, 1809, nearly the whole country was liberated. Napoleon, however, at once marched three armies to the Tyrol, to subdue the rebellious peasantry. At first Hofer concealed himself in a cave, but when Speckbacher, Joachim Haspinger, a Capuchin, and Peter Mayer, at the head of the armed population, renewed the defense of the Tyrol, and repeatedly defeated the enemy, Hofer issued from his retreat, and took the leadership of the Tyrolese. At the battle fought August 13th on the Iselberg, Lefebvre was driven from the Tyrol. Hofer continued to conduct the civil and military administration until the peace of Vienna. The French and Bavarians poured into the country for the third or fourth time, and after a brief struggle Hofer was obliged to take refuge in concealment. After a lapse of two months he was betrayed into the hands of the French by a priest named Douay, conveyed to Mantua, tried, and condemned to be shot. The sentence was carried into execution in 1810.

Hoff (hŏf), Jakobus Hendrikus van't, Dutch chemist, was born at Rotterdam, 1852. He was appointed professor of chemistry, mineralogy, and geology at Amsterdam, and in 1896 became professor of chemistry in the university of Berlin. He made notable researches in physical chemistry, and was the founder of stereo-chemistry. In 1901 he received the Nobel prize for the most important contribution to chemistry. Died, 1911.

Höffding (hûf'-dĕng), Harald, Danish psychologist, philosopher, and educator, professor of philosophy, university of Copenhagen, was born in 1843. He graduated from the university of Copenhagen, and received his Ph. D. in 1870; D. Sc., Oxford; LL. D., St. Andrews, Aberdeen. Was lecturer at the university, 1880, and became professor of philosophy, 1883. He is a member of the royal Danish society of letters and sciences; correspondent de l'Institut de France, etc. Author: Psychology, reprinted in German, Russian, French, English, Spanish, and Polish editions; Ethics; History of Modern Philosophy; Philosophical Problems; Modern Philosophers; The Philosophy of Religion, etc.

Hoffmann, Ernst Theodor Wilhelm, German writer, composer, critic, and caricaturist, was born at Königsberg, 1776. In 1797 he was appointed assessor at Posen; but his love of caricature got him into trouble, and he was degraded to an inferior post. For the next ten years he led a precarious existence, writing meantime a remarkable essay on Mozart's Don Juan, composing an opera on Fouqué's Undine, and for two months during 1808 was director of the theater at Bamberg. In 1815 he resumed his career in the Prussian service, and from 1816 until his death held a position in the supreme court at Berlin. Hoffmann was the arch-priest of ultra-German romanticism. He waged incessant war upon the sticklers for routine and conventionalism. His wit bubbled over in irony, ridicule, sarcasm; and his imagination was inexaustible, but utterly undisciplined, wild, and fantastic. His shorter tales were mostly published in the collections Phantasiestücke, Nachtstücke, and Die Serapionsbrüder. His longer works include Die Elixiere des Teufels; Seltsame Leiden eines Theaterdirektors; Klein Zaches, and Lebensansichten des Katers Murr, partly autobiographical. Of his fairy tales, Der Goldene Topf was translated by Carlyle in 1827. Died, 1822.

Hofmann, August Wilhelm von, German chemist, was born at Giessen, 1818. He became assistant there to Liebig, and, when the royal college of chemistry was established in London in 1845, Hofmann was made superintendent. From 1856 to 1865 he was chemist to the British royal mint. In 1865 he went to Berlin as professor of chemistry, and, ennobled in 1888, died there in 1892. His contributions to the scientific journals were mainly on organic chemistry. In the course of these researches he obtained aniline from coal-tar products. He devoted much labor to the theory of chemical types. His Introduction to Modern Chemistry led to great reforms in the teaching of chemistry. He wrote The Life-work of Liebig; on the chemists Wöhler and Dumas; and Chemische Erinnerungen.

Hogarth (hō'-gärth), William, English painter, engraver, and pictorial satirist, was born at London, 1697. He served an apprenticeship to a silversmith; about 1720 began business for himself, first being employed in engraving coats of arms, crests, etc., and designing plates for booksellers; and in 1724 studied art at Sir James Thornhill's school in James street. He made the illustrations for Gray's edition of Butler's Hudibras. He secretly married the daughter of Sir James Thornhill in 1729, and in 1730 began the painting of his satires, among them being: "Harlot's Progress"; "A Midnight Modern Conversation"; "A Rake's Progress"; "The Distressed Poet"; and his masterpiece, the famous "Marriage à la Mode." He died at London, 1764.

Holbein (hōl'-bīn), Hans, or Johann, called "the younger," German painter, was born at Augsburg, 1497. He went to Basel with his brother, Ambrosius, also a painter. About 1526 he contracted an intimacy with Erasmus, whose portrait he painted, and soon after visited England, where he passed the remainder of his life. Henry VIII. made him court painter. He is distinguished as an historical and portrait painter, and engraver on wood. As an engraver he is chiefly known by the celebrated "Dance of Death," a series of fifty-three woodcuts engraved from his own designs, although it is seldom found with more than forty-six. He also painted the "Madonna of the Burgomaster Meyer of Basel"; "The Ambassadors"; "The Last Supper"; "The Dead Christ"; "The Nativity"; "The Adoration of the Magi," etc. Died, 1543.

Holberg (hōl'-bĕrᴋ), Ludvig, Baron, creator of modern Danish literature, was born at Bergen in Norway, 1684. He studied at the university of Copenhagen, became professor of metaphysics at Copenhagen in 1718, and maintained his connection with the university up to the time of his death in 1754. His first notable works were satirical poems, among them Peder Paars, in which he ridicules the pedantic stiffness and stupidity of contemporary life and thought. In 1721 the first Danish theater was opened at Copenhagen, and Holberg began to write comedies with marvelous success. After 1724 he turned to history, and wrote, among other books, a History of Denmark; General Church History; History of the Jews, and Comparative Biographies of Great Men and Women. In 1741 he produced another classic, the romance Niels Klim's Subterranean Journey; and lastly the serious reflective works, Moral Thoughts and Epistles, and his own Autobiography. Peder Paars, the Subterranean Journey, and the Autobiography have been translated into English.

Holden (hōl-den), Edward Singleton, American astronomer, was born in St. Louis, Mo., 1846. He was graduated at the scientific school in Washington university in 1866, at West Point in 1870, and was appointed second lieutenant of artillery. For a year he was at Fort Johnson, N. C., was assistant professor at West Point, and in 1872 became instructor of the engineer corps. In 1873 he became professor of mathematics in the United States navy, and was ordered to the naval observatory at Washington, D. C. In 1881 he became professor of astronomy in the university of Wisconsin and director of the Washburn observatory, where he remained with brief intermissions until 1885, and published four volumes of observations. In 1883 he visited the Caroline islands to observe a total eclipse of the sun. He was president of the university of California, 1885–88; director of the Lick observatory on Mt. Hamilton, 1888–98; and librarian of the United States military academy since 1901.

Holland, Sir Henry, English physician and writer, was born at Knutsford, Cheshire, 1788. He was graduated at Edinburgh, 1811, and in 1815 published Travels in Albania, Thessaly, etc. He settled in London in 1816; became one of the most eminent members of his profession; in 1840 was appointed physician to the prince consort, in 1852 to the queen; and in 1853 was created a baronet. He published Medical Notes and Reflections; Chapters on Mental Physiology; Essays on Scientific Subjects; Recollections of A Past Life, etc. He died in London, 1873.

Holland, Josiah Gilbert, American writer, was born at Belchertown, Mass., 1819. He studied medicine and practiced for some three years, and then became superintendent of public schools at Vicksburg, Miss. He was connected with the Springfield Republican from 1849 until 1866; was one of the founders of Scribner's Magazine in 1870, and remained editor of it and of its successor, the Century Magazine, until his death. He was a prolific author, and all his books were of a high moral tone. Some of the best known of them are Letters to Young People, Married and Single; Bitter-Sweet; Gold Foil; Miss Gilbert's Career; Arthur Bonnicastle; The Story of Seven Oaks; Nicholas Minturn, etc. Died at New York, 1881.

Holland, Thomas Erskine, English law writer and educator, professor of international law and diplomacy at Oxford, was born in 1835. He was graduated at Oxford; D. C. L., Oxford; LL. D., Bologna, Glasgow, Dublin. He became a barrister in 1863, and Vinerian reader in English law, 1874. He is a fellow of the British academy; associate of the royal academy of Belgium; hon. professor in the university of Perugia; hon. member of the university of St. Petersburg, of the juridical society of Berlin, of royal academies of Bologna and Padua, and of the American society of international law, etc. He was British plenipotentiary at the Geneva conference, 1906; bencher, Lincoln's Inn, 1907. Author: The Elements of Jurisprudence; The Institutes of Justinian; An Essay on Composition Deeds; Essays on the Form of the Law; The European Concert in the Eastern Question; The Admiralty Manual of Naval Prize Law; Studies in International Law; The Laws and Customs of War on Land; Neutral Duties in a Maritime War, etc.

Holland, William Jacob, educator, naturalist, was born in Jamaica, West Indies, 1848, of American parentage. He was graduated at Amherst, 1869, and Princeton theological seminary, 1874; Ph. D., 1886, Sc. D., 1902, Washington and Jefferson; LL. D., Dickinson, 1896, New York university, 1897, St. Andrews university, 1905. He was a Presbyterian pastor at Pittsburgh, Pa., 1874–91; chancellor Western university of Pennsylvania, 1891–1901; since 1898 director of Carnegie institute, Pittsburgh, Pa. Was naturalist in United States eclipse expedition to Japan, 1887, and to West Africa, 1889. He is regarded as an authority on zoölogy and museum administration. Author: The Butterfly Book; The Moth Book; and of many scientific papers published by the United States government, the zoölogical society of London, etc. Editor of the Annals and Memoirs published by the Carnegie museum.

Holmes, Oliver Wendell, jurist, was born in Boston, Mass., 1841. He was graduated from Harvard, 1861, and from Harvard law school, 1866; LL.D., Harvard, 1895, Yale, 1886. He served three years in the 20th Massachusetts volunteers; was wounded at Ball's Bluff, 1861, at Antietam, 1862, and at Marye's Hill, Fredericksburg, 1863, and received brevets as major, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel. After the war he engaged in practice at Boston, and was editor of the American Law Review, 1870–73. Was a member of the law firm of Shattuck, Holmes and Munroe, 1873–82; was professor of law, Harvard law school, 1882; associate justice, 1882–99, chief-justice, 1899–1902, supreme judicial court of Massachusetts; associate justice of supreme court of United States since December, 1902. Author: The Common Law, lectures at Lowell institute, Speeches, etc. Edited the twelfth edition of Kent's Commentaries.

Holmes, Oliver Wendell, American physician and poet, was born in Cambridge, Mass., 1809. He was graduated at Harvard in 1829, studied law for a period, but subsequently devoted himself to medicine, and, after attendance in the hospitals of Europe for several years, received his degree in medicine in 1836. In 1838 he became professor of anatomy and physiology in Dartmouth college, and in 1847 was appointed to the same chair at Harvard. He gained some reputation as an anatomist, and was, besides, an able microscopist and a skillful auscultator; but his widest fame is as a poet, a wit, and a man of letters. His wit and humor are transcendent, his poetry the perfection of conception and finish, and all his literary efforts of rare originality and excellence. He was also a fascinating and instructive lecturer, while his admirable social qualities endeared him to the large and intellectual circle he so adorned. The first collection of his poems appeared in 1836, and attracted marked attention. Then followed his Phi Beta Kappa poems, Poetry; Terpsichore; Urania; and Astræa, all of which added to his reputation. In 1857 he contributed his Autocrat of the Breakfast Table, a connected series of prose essays, to the Atlantic Monthly, which was followed by The Professor at the Breakfast Table; The Poet at the Breakfast Table; and Over the Teacups. This brilliant series, which was in his happiest vein, was interspersed with poems, and was fraught with humor, pathos, practical wisdom, and a healthy sentiment grateful and refreshing. His after-dinner poems and other short lyrics are not surpassed by any productions of their kind in the language. His various medical addresses, papers, and pamphlets are now a part of our scientific literature; and his other works include Currents and Counter-Currents in Medical Science; Elsie Venner, a romance; Songs in Many Keys; Soundings from the Atlantic; The Guardian Angel; and Mechanism in Thought and Morals. Died, 1894.

Holyoake (hōl'-yōk; hōl'-ĭ-ōk), George Jacob, English reformer, founder of "secularism," was born at Birmingham, 1817. He taught mathematics for several years at the mechanics' institution in Birmingham, lectured on Robert Owen's socialist system, was secretary to Garibaldi's British contingent, edited the Reasoner, and promoted the bill legalizing secular affirmations. Holyoake was the last person imprisoned in England on a charge of atheism. He wrote The Rochdale Pioneers; History of Coöperation in England; Self-help a Hundred Years Ago. Other works are The Limits of Atheism; Trial of Theism; Sixty Years of an Agitator's Life; Public Speaking and Debate, etc. Died, 1906.

Homer. See page 9.

Homer, Winslow, American artist, was born at Boston, 1836. While young he worked at lithography in Boston, and in 1859 went to New York and became a student of art at the academy of design. He obtained the notice of the public by two pictures entitled "Home, Sweet Home," and "The Last Goose at Yuletown." He pursued his studies in Paris, and won recognition as an artist of originality. Among his pictures are "Prisoners from the Front"; "Snap the Whip"; "Eating Watermelon"; "Flowers for the Teacher"; "Undertow"; "Eight Bells"; and the marine paintings: "A Northeaster"; "Stormbeaten"; "The Maine Coast," his masterpiece; and "Wood's Island by Moonlight." The last named gained the medal of honor at the exhibition of the academy of fine arts at Philadelphia in 1906. Died, 1910.

Homiakoff, Nicholas Alexeievitch, Russian statesman, president of the Russian duma, was born in 1850. His father was a well-known member of the Slavophil school, and he is the godson of Gogol. He was for some years director of the department of agriculture, and became a member of the second duma, taking his place among the "Octobrists." He is an ardent upholder of the constitution, and a strong believer in reform.

Honorius (hō-nō'-rĭ-ŭs), Flavius, emperor of the West, was born at Constantinople, 384 A. D. He was the second son of Theodosius the Great, at whose death the empire was divided between his sons Arcadius and Honorius. The latter when only ten years old received the western half. Stilicho was the de facto ruler of the western empire until 408; and after his death Alaric the Goth overran Italy, and took Rome in 410.

Honorius died at Ravenna, which he had made his capital, in 423.

Hood, John Bell, American general, was born in Kentucky, 1831. He was graduated from the United States military academy in 1853, and appointed lieutenant of infantry in the same year. He was actively engaged on frontier duty until 1861, when he entered the confederate army, where he served in every position from first lieutenant to that of division commander with the rank of lieutenant-general. He took a conspicuous part in the Virginia peninsular campaign, at the second battle of Bull Run, Antietam, Gettysburg, and Chickamauga, where he lost a leg, and in 1864 succeeded Johnston in command of the army resisting Sherman's invasion of Georgia. He met the federal forces in battle at Franklin, Tenn., 1864, and at Nashville, December 15-16, soon after which he was relieved by General Richard Taylor. He died in 1879.

Hood, Samuel, Viscount, English admiral, was born at Thorncombe, Dorset, 1724. He entered the British navy in 1741, and became post-captain in 1756. In command of the frigate Vestal, he took a French frigate after a fiercely-contested action, 1759. In 1778 he was made commissioner of the Portsmouth dockyard. In 1780, promoted to flag rank, he was sent to reinforce Rodney on the North American and West Indian stations; in 1781 he fought an action with De Grasse, and was engaged in the battle of the Chesapeake. In the West Indies in 1782 he showed himself a masterly tactician in the series of manœuvres by which he outwitted De Grasse off St. Kitts; and he had a conspicuous share in the decisive victory of Dominica. For his services he was made Baron Hood in the Irish peerage. In 1784 he was elected to parliament for Westminster against Fox; and in 1788 became a lord of the admiralty. In 1793, appointed to the Mediterranean, he directed the occupation of Toulon and the operations in the gulf of Lyons. In 1796 he was made Viscount Hood, and died at Bath, 1816.

Hood, Thomas, English poet and humorist, was born in London, 1799. In 1821 he was offered the post of sub-editor of the London Magazine, at once entered upon its duties and acquired an extensive literary acquaintance. His first separate publication was entitled Odes and Addresses to Great People. He published Whims and Oddities in 1826, of which a second and third series appeared during the following two years. In 1829 he commenced The Comic Annual, and continued it for nine years. He edited The Gem for one year, contributing to its pages his striking poem entitled Eugene Aram's Dream. In 1831 he wrote his novel of Tylney Hall. In 1838 he commenced the publication of Hood's Own, to which his portrait was attached. In 1844 he started Hood's Magazine, and contributed to its pages until within a month of his death. His Song of the Shirt and Bridge of Sighs are among the most perfect poems of their kind in the English language. He died in 1845.

Hooke, Robert, English natural philosopher, was born at Freshwater, isle of Wight, 1635. He was educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford. In 1662 he became curator of experiments to the royal society, and in 1677 its secretary; in 1665 professor of geometry at Gresham college; and after the great London fire of 1666 surveyor of works. He has justly been considered one of the greatest philosophical mechanics. His theory of gravitation subsequently formed part of Newton's; he anticipated the invention of the steam-engine. His other discoveries were the law of the extension and compression of elastic bodies, the simplest theory of the arch, the balance-spring of watches and the anchor-escapement clocks. The quadrant, telescope, and microscope are also materially indebted to him. He died in 1703.

Hooker, Joseph, American general, was born in Hadley, Mass., 1814. He was graduated at West Point in 1837, and fought in the Florida and Mexican wars, being three times promoted for gallant conduct. In 1853 he resigned, and became a farmer in California. When the civil war began he entered the army again, and soon became a major-general. He fought under McClellan on the march to Richmond, and afterward in northern Virginia and Maryland, receiving a wound at the battle of Antietam. His bravery in action brought him the nickname "Fighting Joe Hooker." In January, 1863, he was made commander of the army of the Potomac, and in May he fought the bloody battle of Chancellorsville. Owing to a difference between Hooker and his commander-in-chief, General Halleck, the former resigned his command, June 28, 1863, but he still served as a major-general, and fought under Sherman at Atlanta. After the war he commanded in different departments, and in 1868 retired from the army. He died at Garden City, N. Y., 1879.

Hooker, Sir Joseph Dalton, British botanist, was born at Halesworth, Suffolk, in 1817. He graduated as an M. D., but has always devoted his attention to botany. He joined the antarctic expedition of the Erebus and Terror. When he returned, in 1843, he brought with him 5,340 species of plants, which were described and published under the title of Flora Antarctica. His Himalayan Journals and the Rhododendrons of the Sikkim-Himalaya were important additions to our knowledge of botany. In 1871 he made an expedition to Morocco, ascended the Greater Atlas, the summit of which had never before been reached by a European, and secured a valuable collection of plants. He was appointed assistant-director at Kew gardens in 1855, and, on the death of his father in 1865, succeeded him as director, retiring in 1885. He was president of the British association in 1868, and was elected president of the royal society in 1872. His great work, which he undertook in conjunction with George Bentham, is the Genera Plantarum, the first part of which appeared in 1862; and the first part of the second volume, bringing down the work to the Compositae, was published in 1873. Died, 1911.

Hooker, Richard, English theologian and writer, was born in Exeter, England, 1554. He was graduated from Oxford, 1574, was a fellow of Corpus Christi college, Oxford, and deputy professor of Hebrew. The archbishop of York promoted him to the mastership of the Temple in London, 1585. The morning and afternoon services belonged respectively to him and to Walter Travers, the one inclining to the Arminian view and maintaining the Anglican form of worship, the other maintaining Calvinistic opinions and inclining to the Presbyterian form. A controversy arose, which was the occasion of Hooker's great work on Ecclesiastical Polity. In 1591 he became rector of Boscombe, Wiltshire, where he completed the first four books of the work. From 1595 he was rector of Bishopsbourne, Kent. Died, 1600.

Hooker, Thomas, English clergyman and American colonist, was born at Markfield, Leicester, about 1586. He became a fellow of Emmanuel college, Cambridge, and was for three years a Puritan lecturer at Chelmsford. In 1630 he retired to Holland; in 1633 sailed for Massachusetts, and received a charge at Cambridge. In 1636 he removed with his congregation to Connecticut, and founded Hartford. He was joint-author, with John Cotton, of the Survey of the Summe of Church Discipline. Died, 1647.

Hopkins, Albert J., lawyer, ex-United States senator, was born in Dekalb county, Ill., 1846. He was graduated at Hillsdale college, 1870, studied law, and was admitted to the Illinois bar. He was state's attorney, Kane county, 1872–76; presidential elector, 1884; member of congress, 1885–1903, 8th Illinois district; United States senator from Illinois, 1903–09. He was supported by the republican congressional delegation of Illinois as candidate for speaker, 56th congress.

Hopkins, Edward Washburn, American oriental scholar, professor of Sanskrit, Yale university since 1895; was born at Northampton, Mass., 1857. He was graduated at Columbia, 1878; Ph. D., Leipzig university, 1881; LL. D., Columbia, 1902. Was instructor at Columbia, 1881–85; professor of Greek, Sanskrit, and comparative philology, Bryn Mawr college, 1885–95. Author: Caste in Ancient India; Manu's Lawbook; Religions of India; The Great Epic of India; India, Old and New; and many special essays on oriental and linguistic subjects. He was editor of the Journal of American Oriental Society, 1897-1907.

Hopkins, Mark, American educator, was born in Massachusetts, 1802. He was graduated at Williams college in 1824, and received the degree of M. D. in 1828; was professor of moral philosophy and rhetoric in Williams college from 1830 until his death; was president of the college, 1836–72; in 1857 became president of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions. He is the author of Evidences of Christianity, Law of Love and Love as a Law, and An Outline Study of Man. Died, 1887.

Hopkinson, Francis, American politician and author, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., 1737. He was a delegate to the continental congress from New Jersey, and was one of the signers of the declaration of independence. He wrote The Battle of the Kegs; The Pretty Story; The Political Catechism, and other works in prose and verse. His son, Joseph, judge of the United States district court, wrote "Hail Columbia." Died, 1791.

Hopper, De Wolf, comedian, was born in New York, 1858. He made his first professional appearance in Our Boys, 1878; later with Daniel Frohman's Madison square company as Pittacus Green in Hazel Kirke and other rôles; studied vocal music and joined the McCaull opera company. For several years he starred in comedy rôles at the head of his own company; later with Weber and Fields company; then again starred at the head of his own company, playing Mr. Pickwick. He became famous in Wang and a later production, Happyland.

Horace, Quintus Horatius Flaccus, famous Roman poet, was born at Venusia, Italy, 65 B. C. Athens was at this time regarded as the university of the world, and thither Horace repaired in his nineteenth year to complete his education by a course of philosophy and science under Greek masters. But the civil wars which followed the death of Julius Cæsar, in 44 B. C., interrupted him in his studies. The arrival of Brutus at Athens roused the patriotic feelings of the youthful Romans, and along with others Horace ardently embraced the cause of the republic. Though entirely inexperienced in war, he was promoted to the rank of military tribune, with the command of a legion, and in this character shared in the defeat at Philippi, 42 B. C. After the battle he returned to Rome, and by acting as clerk in the quæstor's office he contrived to live until he found means of making himself known to the poets Varius and Virgil, by whom his name was first mentioned to Mæcenas. The first interview with his future patron and friend seems not to have been satisfactory, for it was not until after nine months had elapsed that Mæcenas requested him to repeat his visit. The friend of the prime minister found easy access to the emperor; Horace was soon on terms of familiarity with Augustus, and enjoyed his friendship and patronage during the remainder of his life. But the friendship of Mæcenas, who gave him an estate in the Sabine territory, about thirty-four miles from Rome, made him independent for life. His admiration of the beautiful scenery in the neighborhood of Tibur (Tivoli) induced him to pass his life between his country residence and Rome. His works consist of two books of Satires, a book of Epodes, four books of Odes, two books of Epistles, and a treatise on the Art of Poetry. Died, 8 B. C.

Hornaday (hôr'-nȧ-dā), William Temple, American naturalist, director of the New York zoölogical park since 1896, was born in Plainfield, Ind., 1854. He was educated at Iowa agricultural college; studied zoölogy and museology in this country and Europe, and as collecting zoölogist visited Cuba, Florida, the West Indies, South America, India, Ceylon, the Malay peninsula, and Borneo, 1875–79. He was chief taxidermist of United States national museum, 1882–90; in real estate business at Buffalo, N. Y., 1890–96. Author: Two Years in the Jungle; Free Rum on the Congo; The Extermination of the American Bison; Taxidermy and Zoölogical Collecting; The Man Who Became a Savage; The American Natural History; Camp-Fires in Canadian Rockies, etc.

Hornblower, William Butler, American lawyer, was born in Paterson, N. J., 1851. He was graduated at Princeton university, 1871; LL. B., Columbia law school, 1875; LL. D., Princeton, 1895, and is now a member of the firm of Hornblower, Miller and Potter of New York. He was a member of the commission appointed by Governor Hill, 1890, to propose amendments to the judiciary article of the New York constitution; was appointed, 1893, by President Cleveland, associate justice of the United States supreme court, but was not confirmed by senate owing to opposition by New York senators for political reasons. Howard, John, noted English philanthropist, was born near London, 1726. In 1756, after the Lisbon earthquake, he sailed for that city to relieve the sufferers, and on his voyage was captured by a French privateer and imprisoned. Appointed high sheriff of Bedford in 1773, his attention was called to the state of the prisons of the country, the condition of which, and the sufferings inflicted upon the prisoners, reminded him of sufferings he had himself undergone. His sympathies thus once aroused, he extended his inquiries over the whole kingdom, bringing to light an amount of misery and degradation of which hitherto his countrymen had had no conception. In 1774 he was examined before a committee of the house of commons, and many reforms were the result. In 1775 he set out on an extended tour through France, Holland, and Germany, with the view of acquainting himself with the state of continental prisons; and in 1777 after another tour through England, he published a volume entitled, The State of the Prisons in England and Wales, with Preliminary Observations, and an Account of some Foreign Prisons. The philanthropic work thus entered upon engaged him wholly for the rest of his life. His later years were spent in visiting the principal lazarettos and hospitals of Europe, an account of which he published in 1789. Died, 1790.

Howitt (hou'-ĭt), William and Mary, English authors, may properly be treated together. William Howitt was born in 1792, at Heanor, in Derbyshire. In 1823 he married Miss Mary Botham, a lady of literary acquirements, born 1799, and whose family, like his own, was attached to the principles of Quakerism. The Forest Minstrel, with their joint names on the title-page, was published during the year in which they were married. For three or four years thereafter they employed themselves in contributions to annuals and magazines, and in 1827 a selection from these fugitive pieces appeared under the title of The Desolation of Eyam. From this date until 1837 William wrote The Book of Seasons, Popular History of Priestcraft, and Tales of the Pantika. During the same period Mary produced The Seven Temptations and a country novel entitled Wood-Leighton. In 1837 they removed to Esher, in Surrey, and at that place William wrote Rural Life in England, Colonization and Christianity, Boy's Country Book, and Visits to Remarkable Places, first series. Mary at the same time employed herself in writing Tales for Children, many of which are popular. In 1852 William went to Australia, where he remained two years, and on his return published the following works: Land, Labor, and Gold; or, Two Years in Victoria, with Visits to Sydney and Van Diemen's Land, etc. William died in 1879; Mary died in 1888.

Hoxie, Vinnie Ream, sculptor, was born in Madison, Wis., 1847. After modeling one year she received a commission from congress, in 1862, to execute a life-size statue of Abraham Lincoln. He sat for his bust at the White House, and his statue is now in the rotunda of the capitol. Later congress commissioned her to make the heroic statue of Admiral Farragut which now stands in Farragut square, Washington. These are the only two statues ever ordered by the United States government from a woman. She executed ideal statues of "Miriam," "The West," "Sappho," "The Spirit of the Carnival," etc.; also busts in marble of Mayor Powell, now in the city hall, Brooklyn; President Lincoln, for Cornell university, and other distinguished Europeans and Americans. She married Colonel Richard L. Hoxie, United States engineers, 1878.

Huc (ük; hŭk), Évariste Régis, Roman Catholic missionary, was born at Toulouse, 1813. In 1839 he joined the mission of the Lazarist fathers to China. In 1844 with Père Gabet and a single native convert, he set out for Tibet, and in January, 1846, reached Lhasa. Scarcely had a mission been started there, when an order for their expulsion was obtained by the Chinese resident, and they were conveyed back to Canton. Huc's health having broken down, he returned to France in 1852. He wrote Souvenirs of his great journey, L'Empire Chinois, Le Christianisme en Chine, etc. Died, 1860.

Hudson, Henry, English navigator, of whose early life nothing is known. In 1607 he sailed in search of a short route to China and India by way of the northern ocean, but was stopped by the ice off the coast of Greenland and forced to return. In 1609, while in the service of the Dutch East India company, he discovered the Hudson river, and sailed up to where Albany now stands. On a fourth voyage, 1610, he discovered Hudson strait and bay, which are also named after him. Impeded by ice, he determined to spend the winter on the shores of the bay. Here he and his men suffered terribly from want of food and started to return in 1611. The men mutinied on the return voyage, got possession of the ship, put Hudson, his son John, and seven sailors into an open boat and turned them adrift. Nothing was ever known of their fate.

Hufeland (hŏŏ'-fĕ-länt), Christoph Wilhelm, noted German physician, was born at Langensalza, in Thuringia, 1762. He was educated in Germany, became court physician at Weimar, in 1793 professor of medicine at Jena, in 1798 president of the medical college at Berlin, and in 1809 professor in the university of Berlin. His Makrobiotik, or the Art of Prolonging Life, has been translated into almost all the European languages; he also wrote a work on the physical education of the young, and an Enchiridion Medicum. Died, 1836.

Huggins (hŭg'-ĭnz), Sir William, English astronomer and spectroscopist, was born in London, 1824. In 1852 he was elected a member of the British microscopical society, and for some years studied physiology with the microscope. But having in 1856 built an observatory near London, he began the study of the physical constitution of stars, planets, comets, and nebulæ. By researches on the sun's spectra and the spectra of certain comets, he ascertained that their luminous properties are not the same. He determined the amount of heat that reaches the earth from some of the fixed stars. He became a fellow of the royal society, 1865, and president, 1900. He was president of the British association, and received the order of merit in 1902. Died, 1910.

Hugh Capet (hū kă'-pĕt), founder of the third or Capetian dynasty of French monarchs, was born 939 and was king of France, 987–996. As count of Paris, on the death of Louis V., last of the Carlovingians, he usurped the throne and was confirmed in its possession by a confederacy of nobles. The race of Capet has given 119 sovereigns to Europe, thirty-six kings to France, twenty-two to Portugal, five to Spain, eleven to Naples and Sicily, three to Hungary, and three to Navarre; three emperors to the East; seventeen dukes to Burgundy, thirteen to Brittany, two to Lorraine, and four to Parma. Died, 996.

Hunt, Helen. See Jackson, Helen Hunt.

Hunt, James Henry Leigh, English poet and essayist, was born at Southgate, near London, 1784. He was a school-fellow, at Christ's hospital, of Coleridge and Charles Lamb, and at one time the friend of Byron. In 1813, as editor of The Examiner, he wrote some articles severely criticising the prince regent, afterward George IV., and for these he was prosecuted by order of the government, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment in the Surrey jail. While in jail he wrote The Descent of Liberty, a Masque; The Story of Rimini, an Italian tale in verse; and The Feast of the Poets. In 1818 he commenced a small periodical called The Indicator, in which many of his essays appeared. In 1828 he published Lord Byron and some of his Contemporaries, in which, having quarreled with Byron during a visit to Italy, he indulged in some severe animadversions upon the character of that poet. All his life was devoted to literature, and all his writings have a fascination of their own. Among his last works was his Autobiography. He died at Putney, England, 1859.

Hunt, Thomas Sterry, American chemist and geologist, was born in Connecticut, 1826. In 1845 he became assistant to Professor Silliman in his chemical laboratory at Yale college, and in 1847 was appointed chemist and mineralogist to the geographical survey of Canada. He held this post for more than twenty-five years, resigning in 1872 to accept the chair of geology in the Massachusetts institute of technology. His contributions to American and European scientific societies and journals are very numerous; and a collection of many of them was published in 1874. He furnished many important articles in his specialty to Appleton's American Cyclopedia, and was a member of the leading societies of both continents. He published: Chemical and Geological Essays; The Domain of Physiology; A New Basis for Chemistry, etc. He died in New York, 1892.

Hunt, Walter, English painter, was born in Middlesex, England, 1861. He has been a constant exhibitor at the royal academy since 1881. The following are among his best pictures: "A Rainy Day"; "Pensioners"; "Toby"; "The Dogs' Home"; "Waiting to be Fed"; "Foundlings"; "Retribution"; "The Dog in the Manger"; "Overmatched"; "To the Rescue"; "A Foster-Mother"; "The Orphan"; "The Otter Hunt — the Find"; "Puss at Bay"; "Babes in the Wood"; "Off the Scent"; "Motherless"; "An Old Offender"; "Home from Work," etc.

Hunt, William Henry, creator of the English school of water-color painting, was born in London, 1790, the crippled child of a tinplate worker. He is ranked by Ruskin with the greatest colorists of the school. He generally chose very simple subjects for his pictures, such as: "Peaches and Grapes"; "Old Pollard"; "Wild Flowers"; "Too Hot"; "Fast Asleep," etc., but they are conceived in a finely poetical spirit, and present the perfection of finish. Died, 1864.

Hunt, William Holman, English painter, was born in London, 1827. In 1845 he was admitted a student of the royal academy, and next year exhibited his first picture, "Hark!" followed by scenes from Dickens and Scott, and by the "Flight of Madeline and Porphyro," in 1848. He shared a studio with D. G. Rossetti, and the two, along with Millais and a few others, inaugurated the "pre-Raphaelite brotherhood," which aimed at detailed and uncompromising truth to nature. Among the first of his pre-Raphaelite works was "Rienzi," in 1849. It was followed by "A Converted British Family sheltering a Christian Missionary"; "Valentine rescuing Sylvia"; "The Hireling Shepherd"; "Claudio and Isabella"; "Strayed Sheep"; and "The Light of the World," now in Keble college, Oxford. The result of several visits to the East appeared in "The Scapegoat"; "The Finding of Christ in the Temple," now in the Birmingham art gallery; "The Shadow of Death," in the corporation gallery, Manchester; and "The Triumph of the Innocents," to which must be added "Isabella and the Pot of Basil," "May Morning in Magdalen Tower." In 1905 he was nominated to the order of merit, and was made a D. C. L. by Oxford. Died, 1910.

Hunt, William Morris, American genre and portrait painter, was born in Brattleboro, Vermont, 1824. He was educated at Düsseldorf, and under Couture at Paris; but made the technique of the French school subsidiary to his own original ideas, and was one of the first to introduce the characteristics of the French school into the United States. Among his productions are: "The Lost Kid"; "The Choristers"; "Girl at the Fountain"; "Marguerite"; "Morning Star"; "Bugle Call," etc. He also painted portraits of many celebrated persons, excelling in this department of art, but gaining his high reputation through his skill and originality in genre-painting. He painted "The Flight of Night," and other decorations in the state capitol at Albany, N. Y. Died, 1879.

Hunter, John, noted British surgeon, anatomist, and physiologist, was born in Lanarkshire, Scotland, 1728. He spent five years at the university of Edinburgh, and, deciding to adopt the profession of medicine, went to London and studied at Chelsea hospital. His progress in anatomy and surgery was so rapid that in the second session he was able to undertake the directing of the pupils in their dissections. He studied surgery under Cheselden at Chelsea hospital during the summer months of 1749 and 1750, and subsequently under Pott. After ten years in the dissecting room his health gave way, and in 1759 he applied for an appointment in the British army, was immediately made staff-surgeon, and sent out to Belle isle, and afterward to the peninsula. In 1763, peace having been proclaimed, he settled permanently in London as a surgeon. In 1767 he was elected a fellow of the royal society, and in the following year was appointed surgeon to St. George's hospital. In 1776 he was appointed surgeon-extraordinary to the king. In 1785 he built a museum, which became the place of meeting of the Lyceum Medicum, a society established by Hunter and Fordyce. His famous operation for the cure of aneurism, that of simply tying the artery at a distance from the tumor, and between it and the heart, has been more fruitful in important results than any since Ambroise Paré's application of ligatures to divided arteries. He wrote Natural History of the Human Teeth; Treatise on Blood, Inflammation, and Gunshot Wounds, etc. He died in 1793, and was buried in the church of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, London, but was removed in 1859 to Westminster abbey.

Huntingdon (hŭn'-tĭng-dŭn), Selina, Countess of, daughter of Earl Ferrers, was born in 1707. She married the earl of Huntingdon, 1728, and became a widow in 1746. Joining the Methodists in 1739, she made Whitefield her chaplain in 1748, and assumed a leadership among his followers, who became known as "the countess of Huntingdon's connection." For the education of ministers she established in 1768 a college at Trevecca in Brecknockshire, and built or bought numerous chapels, the principal one at Bath. She died in London, 1791, bequeathing to four persons her sixty-four chapels, most of which became identical with the Congregational churches.

Huntington, Daniel, American painter, was born in New York, 1816, and was educated at Hamilton college. In 1835 he began to study art under Morse, and still later with Inman. In 1839 he visited Italy; returned the next year and commenced work, but was compelled to desist in consequence of failing eyesight. He was again in Europe in 1844, where he painted some noteworthy pictures. After his return he was engaged chiefly on portraits, but painted also a few historical pictures. Among them are: "Henry VIII. and Catharine Parr," and "Mary Signing the Death Warrant of Lady Jane Grey." Thereafter he became a permanent resident of New York, and painted the portraits of many notable people. He is probably best known by his picture, "The Republican Court in the Time of Washington," in which there are more than sixty figures, of which nearly all are accurate portraits taken from original paintings. He was for many years president of the national academy of design. Died, 1906.

Hunyadi (hŏŏn'-yŏd-ĭ), János, Hungarian general, was born at Hunyad, Transylvania, about 1387. He was governor of Transylvania in 1442, and distinguished himself against the Turks, who at that time were the terror of the whole of Christendom. During the period of his rule he was the shield of Hungary, not only against external foes, but also against the lawless attempts of the nobles. During the minority of Ladislaus V. he was elected regent of Hungary. The most splendid of his deeds was the storming of Belgrade, where the monk John Capistran, carrying the holy cross, raised the enthusiasm of the Christian warriors to such a height that a most complete victory brought that fortress again into the possession of the Hungarians. Shortly after dysentery broke out in the camp, and Hunyadi, after a short illness, died in 1456.

Hurd, Henry Mills, American physician, superintendent Johns Hopkins hospital, 1889–1911; was born in Union City, Mich., 1843. He was graduated at the university of Michigan, 1863, M. D., 1866, A. M., 1870, LL. D., 1895. Was superintendent eastern Michigan asylum, Pontiac, 1878–89, and professor psychiatry, 1889–1906, Johns Hopkins. He was president of the American academy of medicine, 1896; secretary, 1892–97, and president, 1898–99, American medico-psychological association. Editor American Journal of Insanity since 1897; of Johns Hopkins Hospital Bulletin and of Johns Hopkins Hospital Reports, 1890–1911. Author: Hints to Hospital Visitors, with Dr. John S. Billings; also editor, with same, Hospitals, Dispensaries and Nursing, 1893.

Hurlbut, Jesse Lyman, Methodist Episcopal clergyman, editor, was born in New York, 1843. He was graduated at Wesleyan university, Connecticut, 1864. Was pastor Methodist Episcopal churches, 1865–79; agent Sunday school union, Methodist Episcopal church, 1879–84; assistant editor of Sunday school literature, 1884–88; editor of Sunday school literature and secretary of Sunday school union and tract society, 1888–1900; pastor Morristown, N. J., 1901–04; South Orange, N. J., 1904–05; Bloomfield, N. J., 1906–09; district superintendent, Newark district, since 1909. Author: Outline Normal Lessons; Studies in the Four Gospels; Studies in Old Testament History; Revised Normal Lessons; Manual of Biblical Geography; Our Church; Hurlbut's Story of the Bible, etc.

Hurst (hûrst), John Fletcher, American clergyman and writer, was born in Maryland, 1834. He was graduated at Dickinson college, and became a Methodist Episcopal clergyman. In 1871, after some years of travel in Europe, he became professor of theology in Drew seminary, Madison, N. J., and from 1873 until 1880 was president of that institution. At Cincinnati in the last-named year he was elected bishop. In 1891 he was made chancellor of the American university, at Washington. He published: History of Rationalism; Outline of Church History; Short History of the Reformation; Short History of the Medieval Church; The Success of the Gospel, etc. He died at Washington, 1903.

Huss, or Hus (hŭs; Ger., hŏŏs), John, Bohemian religious reformer, was born at Husinetz, in Bohemia, in 1369. He studied at the university of Prague, was appointed dean of the philosophical faculty in 1401, and rector of the university, 1402. He also became in the latter year preacher in the Bethlehem chapel in Prague, and labored with the greatest earnestness for the instruction of the people, and in the discharge of all his clerical functions. As a preacher he was greatly esteemed both by the common people and by the students, while as confessor to Queen Sophia he obtained access to the court. At this time he became acquainted with the writings of Wycliffe, which exercised a great influence over him. Archbishop Sbinko burned the writings of Wycliffe in 1410, in compliance with a brief of Pope Alexander V., and complained to the pope of Huss as a Wycliffite. In 1412, Pope John XXIII. having published a bull of indulgence in order to organize a crusade against Ladislaus, the excommunicated king of Naples, whose kingdom the pope claimed as a papal fief, Huss boldly raised his voice against the whole procedure as unchristian, while Jerome of Prague also stood forth to condemn, in the strongest manner, both the bull and the venders of indulgences. An interdict against Huss in 1412 was the consequence. Huss, however, appealed from the pope to a general council and to Christ, and wrote a book On the Church, in which he condemned the abuses of the papacy, and denied the unconditional supremacy of the Roman pontiff. In 1414 he went to Constance to the general council, under a safe-conduct from the emperor, but his opponents procured his imprisonment as a heretic, and, on refusal to retract, he was burned at the stake, 1415.

Hutcheson (hŭch'-ē-sŭn), Francis, Scottish philosopher, was born in 1694. He studied for the church at Glasgow, 1710–16, and then started a successful private academy in Dublin. His Inquiry into the Original of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue, etc., attracted much notice, and was followed by his Essay on the Passions, 1728. In 1729 he was appointed professor of moral philosophy at Glasgow, where he died in 1746. His largest work is A System of Moral Philosophy. Hutcheson was a pioneer of the Scottish school in metaphysics, and his ethical system is a development of Shaftesbury's.

Hutchins (hŭch'-ĭnz), Harry Burns, American educator, president university of Michigan since 1910, dean of the department of law, 1895-1910; was born at Lisbon, N. H., 1847. He was graduated at the university of Michigan, Ph. B., 1871; LL. D., university of Wisconsin. He was assistant professor of history and rhetoric, university of Michigan, 1872–76, professor of law, 1884–87; professor of law, Cornell, 1887–94; acting president of university of Michigan, 1897-98, and 1909–10. Hutchinson (hŭch'-ĭn-sŭn), Anne, religious enthusiast, was born about 1590, and emigrated from Lincolnshire, England, to Boston, Mass., 1634. Living in a community prone to religious excitement, she claimed to be a medium of divine revelations, and held meetings for women in which she held Antinomian doctrines. Great controversies arose, and a synod was called, in which her teachings were condemned and she was banished from the colony. She and her friends now obtained from the chief of the Narragansetts liberty to reside in Rhode Island, where they set up a community on the highly commendable principle that no one was to be "accounted a delinquent for doctrine." After the death of her husband, who shared her opinions, she removed to a Dutch settlement in the colony of New York, where, in 1643, she and her whole family of fifteen persons were taken prisoners by the Indians, and all but one daughter barbarously murdered.

Hutchinson, Thomas, American magistrate and historian, was born in Boston, 1711. He was graduated at Harvard, and began the practice of law. He was several times elected to the general court, and for three years served as speaker. In 1760 he held at one time four offices: judge of probate, councilor, chief-justice, and lieutenant-governor. In the time of the stamp act he favored the British government, for which his house was sacked and many valuable manuscripts relating to the history of Massachusetts were destroyed. In 1769 he was made governor of the colony, but did not receive his commission until 1771. In 1774 he returned to England, where he died, 1780, having been pensioned by the government. He published The History of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay, and A Brief Statement of the Claims of the Colonies.

He was apprenticed to a wood-carver in Edinburgh at the age of thirteen; executed wood carvings and other decorations in relief for the picture gallery at Hospitalfield, Arbroath, 1852, and studied in Edinburgh and in Rome. Principal works — statues: "Roman Dancing Girl Resting"; "King Robert Bruce"; "Greek Torch Racer"; "John Knox," a colossal bronze statue in Edinburgh, etc.; and busts of Principal Tulloch; Norman Macleod; Queen Victoria, by command of the queen; the prince consort, and other distinguished persons. He executed studies in bronze and marble of ideal subjects: "Hamlet," "Don Quixote," "Dante," etc. Died, 1910.

Hutten (hŏŏt'-en), Ulrich von, German reformer and humanist, was born in 1488. When he was ten years of age he was placed in the monastery at Fulda; but, disliking this mode of life, he fled to Erfurt in 1506, where he associated with scholars and poets. He then lived at various places in northern Germany until 1512, when he went to Pavia to study law. After passing several years in Italy he returned to Germany, and made himself conspicuous by his publications, especially those concerning the affairs of Reuchlin, and displayed no small learning and great power of satire. In 1518 he accompanied Albert, archbishop of Mainz, to the diet of Augsburg, where Luther had his famous conference with Cajetan. He took sides with Luther, was persecuted by his enemies, and availed himself of the protection of Franz von Sickingen, but was soon forced to flee. From this time he was compelled to adopt a wandering life, and died in 1523 in the isle of Ufnau, in the lake of Zürich.

Huxley (hŭks'-lĭ), Thomas Henry, noted English biologist and comparative anatomist, was born at Ealing, England, 1825. He was graduated at London university, 1845. In 1846 he entered the medical service of the royal navy, and did duty at Haslar under the late Sir John Richardson until the winter of the same year, when he was appointed assistant-surgeon on board the Rattlesnake. This vessel, commanded by Captain Owen Stanley, was commissioned to survey the intricate passage within the Barrier Reef, skirting the eastern shores of Australia, and to explore the sea lying between the north end of that reef and New Guinea and the Louisiade archipelago. Imbued with a passion for natural history, Huxley devoted himself with zeal and intelligence to the study of the numerous marine animals collected from time to time during the survey, and made them the subject of scientific papers, which he sent home, diffident as to their value. In 1851 papers on other branches of the same subject were printed in the Philosophical Transactions, and in the same year Huxley was elected a fellow of the royal society. In 1854 he was appointed professor of natural history in the royal school of mines, and among his lectures in that institution he delivered courses to workingmen with beneficial results. In 1857, in conjunction with Dr. Tyndal, he wrote a paper, Observations on Glaciers, which was printed in the Philosophical Transactions; and in the following year delivered the royal society's Croonian lecture On the Theory of the Vertebrate Skull, in which a highly important anatomical question was discussed. In 1872 he was made lord rector of Aberdeen university; was Rede lecturer at Cambridge in 1883, and president of the royal society, 1883–85. Among his many works in addition to those mentioned are: Oceanic Hydrozoa; Evidence as to Man's Place in Nature; Lay Sermons; Critiques and Addresses; Physiography; Elements of Biology; The Crayfish; Science and Culture; Evolution and Ethics, etc. He was an able advocate of Darwinian evolution, and was well known for his agnostic speculations, and as a popularizer of biological science. He died in Eastbourne, England, 1895.

Huygens (hī′-genz; Dutch, hoi′-gĕns), or Huyghens, Christian, Dutch physicist and astronomer, was born at The Hague in 1629. He devoted himself to mathematics, improved the telescope, and devised new methods for grinding and constructing lenses. He also invented the first pendulum clock, defined the rings of Saturn; and developed the wave theory of light. He frequently visited England, was made a fellow of the royal society, 1663, and at the invitation of Louis XIV. lived for a number of years in Paris where he produced many of his scientific works. Died, 1695.

Hypatia (hī-pā′-shĭ-ȧ), Greek female philosopher, daughter of Theon, an astronomer of Alexandria. She was renowned for her knowledge of mathematics and of the Platonic philosophy, of which she was a teacher at Alexandria. She was also celebrated both for beauty and modesty. She met a tragic fate. Being accused by the clergy of undue influence over Orestes, prefect of Alexandria, against St. Cyril, then archbishop there, she was attacked by a mob led by priests, dragged into a church, stripped of her clothing, and killed. This occurred about 415 A. D., when she was about sixty years of age. Hypatia has been made the subject of a romance by Charles Kingsley.

Hyrcanus (hĕr-kā′-nŭs), John, Jewish high priest, who lived about 135 B. C He succeeded his father, Simon Maccabæus, in the high priesthood as one of the Asmonean rulers of Judea. He was at first compelled to pay tribute to Antiochus Sidetes, after whose defeat and death in 130 B. C. he reëstablished his independence, razed Samaria, took several other cities from Syria, conquered the Idumæans, and formed an alliance with the Romans. His reign has been compared to that of Solomon. He was succeeded by his son, Aristobulus, a weak, irresolute character, who took the title of king of Judea. Died about 105 B. C.

In 1686 he joined the expedition of De Troye from Canada against the English forts on Hudson's bay; in 1690 took part in the Indian and French massacre of the inhabitants of Schenectady; in 1694 captured Fort Nelson on Hudson's bay; in 1696 destroyed St. John's, Newfoundland, taking most of that province from the British; and in 1697 defeated them in naval fights in Hudson's bay. Sailing from Brest in 1698 with two frigates he reached the mouth of the Mississippi with his brother Bienville; fortified Biloxi, the first post on the Mississippi, and in 1700 ascended the river. In 1701, on account of the unhealthiness of the climate, he transferred the colony from Louisiana to Mobile, and began the settlement of Alabama. In 1702 he fortified Dauphin island, in Mobile bay; in 1706, with three ships, he captured the isle of Nevis, one of the Leeward group. Died at Havana, Cuba, 1706.

Ibrahim Pasha (ĭb′-rȧ-hēm′ pȧ-shă′), Egyptian general, adopted son of Mehemet Ali, viceroy of Egypt, was born in 1789. Mehemet Ali having conceived the design of adding Syria to his dominions, Ibrahim crossed the Egyptian border with an army in 1831, took Acre by storm, and quickly made himself master of the whole of Syria. When war broke out between Mehemet Ali and the sultan in 1839, Ibrahim was again successful, totally routing the Turks in the great battle of Nisib. The interference of the great powers eventually compelled him to return to Egypt, suffering, during his passage through the desert, the most terrible hardships and losses, while the attempt to elevate Egypt to complete independence came to an end. In 1848, when the aged pasha had sunk into absolute dotage, Ibrahim went to Constantinople and was installed viceroy of Egypt. Died, 1848.

Ibsen (ĭb'-sen; ĭp'-sen), Henrik, Norwegian poet and dramatist, was born at Skien, in south Norway, 1828. He studied medicine, was a chemist's assistant at Grimstad, 1842–50, but soon devoted himself wholly to literature. His first drama, Katilina, was a failure; but after a short period of study at Christiania, and nearly two years of journalism, he became director of Ole Bull's theater at Bergen, for which he wrote five romantic dramas. In 1857 he became director of the national theater in Christiania. His next dramas were The Warriors in Helgeland, The Pretenders, Love's Comedy. The first two, reproducing the spirit of the old sages, placed Ibsen in the foremost rank of Scandinavian dramatists; the last was a precursor of his satirical social dramas. In 1862 the national theater became bankrupt, and Ibsen, enraged because Norway held aloof from the Danes in their struggle against the Germans, forsook his country, 1864–91, living in Rome, Dresden, and Munich. The Norwegian parliament granted him a pension in 1866. In 1866-67 appeared Brand and Peer Gynt, dramatic poems. There followed Emperor and Galilean; Pillars of Society; A Doll's House; Ghosts; An Enemy of the People; The Wild Duck; Rosmersholm; The Lady from the Sea; Hedda Gabler; The Master Builder Solness; Little Eyolf; When We Dead Awaken; and John Gabriel Borkman. These plays aroused a storm of controversy in the literary world from 1889, because of their author's passionate advocacy of individual liberty. The interest and method of his plays are almost exclusively psychological. Died, 1906.

Her beauty and talents drew the attention and love of the emperor Leo IV., and he married her in 769. After his death she ruled as regent, during the minority of her son Constantine VI. She was banished to Lesbos in 802, where she died in the following year. The Greek church counts her among its saints.

Irving, Edward, Scottish preacher, was born at Annan, 1792. He was graduated at Edinburgh university, and in 1810 became a schoolmaster at Haddington, in 1812 at Kirkcaldy. Here three years later he was licensed to preach, and in 1819 was appointed assistant to Dr. Chalmers in Glasgow. In 1822 he was called to the Caledonian church, Hatton Garden, London, and his success there as a preacher was phenomenal. In 1825 he began to announce his convictions in regard to the imminent second advent of Christ; this was followed up by the translation of The Coming of the Messiah, professedly written by a Christian Jew, but really by a Spanish Jesuit. By 1828, when his Homolies on the Sacraments appeared, he had begun to elaborate his views of the incarnation, and was charged with heresy. He was arraigned before the presbytery of London in 1830, convicted of heresy, ejected from his new church in Regent's square in 1832, and finally deposed in 1833 by the presbytery of Annan, which had licensed him. The majority of his congregation supported him, however, and a new communion, the Catholic Apostolic, was developed, commonly known as Irvingite, though Irving had little to do with its development. Shortly after his health failed, and he went to Glasgow, where he died of consumption, 1834.

Irving, Sir Henry (John Henry Brodribb), English actor, was born in Keinton, near Glastonbury, 1838. He acted at the Theater Royal, Edinburgh, 1856–59, 'and afterward for seven years at Manchester. He played in London, 1859, but attracted little notice until his appearance at St. James's theater, 1866. He soon established a connection with the Lyceum, of which he became manager in 1878. There he played his chief parts, in conjunction with Miss Ellen Terry, producing, among other plays, Hamlet, The Merchant of Venice, Faust, Macbeth, Henry VIII., The Bells, and other well-known productions. He first came to the United States in 1883, with Miss Terry and his Lyceum company, and made his début in New York, as Mathias, in The Bells. He made subsequent tours in 1884-85, 1887-88, 1893, and several times thereafter. He died in England, 1905, and was buried in Westminster abbey.

Irving, Isabel, actress, was born at Bridgeport, Conn., 1871. She made her début as Gwendolyn Hawkins in The Schoolmistress, with Rosina Vokes company, 1887; was with Augustin Daly's company, 1888–94; leading woman at Lyceum theater, New York, and in John Drew's company several years; has also played leading rôles in England. She was selected by Charles Frohman to create the rôle of Lady Jocelyn Leigh in To Have and To Hold, at the Knickerbocker theater, New York; later starred under the management of James K. Hackett in The Crisis; played Louise in all-star cast of The Two Orphans, under the management of Liebler and Company, 1905; was engaged by Clyde Fitch to play the comedy part in The Toast of the Town, 1906; was starred by Liebler and Company in Susan in Search of a Husband, and The Girl Who Has Everything, 1907. Created title rôle in Water, 1908; played leading part in The Flag Lieutenant and The Commanding Officer, 1909. She married W. H. Thompson, 1899.

Irving, Washington, distinguished American author, was born in the city of New York, 1783. He was the youngest son of William Irving, who had emigrated from Scotland, and settled in New York as a merchant before the revolution. Irving, at the age of sixteen, entered a law office; but found greater profit from his father's well-stocked library, Chaucer and Spenser being his favorite authors. New York, at this period, was a town of about 50,000 inhabitants, many of whom were descendants of the original Dutch settlers, having quaint manners and customs, of which Irving was a curious observer. In 1804 he visited and traveled extensively in Europe; returned to New York in 1806, and contributed a series of genial and humorous essays to a periodical called Salmagundi. In 1809 he wrote A History of New York, from the Beginning of the World to the End of the Dutch Dynasty, by Diedrick Knickerbocker, a burlesque chronicle written in so quiet a vein of humor that it has sometimes been taken for a veritable history. Having no inclination for law, he engaged in commerce as a silent partner with his brothers, but devoted his time to literature, and in 1813 edited the Analectic Magazine in Philadelphia. At the close of the war, in 1815, he visited England, where he was warmly welcomed by Campbell, whose biography he had formerly written, and was introduced by him to Walter Scott. In 1819 he published the well-known Sketch Book, containing The Legend of Sleepy Hollow and Rip Van Winkle. He then went to Paris, and in 1822 wrote Bracebridge Hall, and in 1824 the Tales of a Traveler. At the invitation of Edward Everett, American ambassador to Spain, he accompanied him to Madrid to translate documents connected with the life of Columbus. With these materials he wrote his History of the Life and Voyages of Columbus, Voyages of the Companions of Columbus, The Conquest of Granada, and many Spanish works. In 1842 he was appointed United States minister to Spain. In 1849 was published his Life of Goldsmith, and his great work, the Life of Washington, was published in 1855–59. He spent the last years of his life at Sunnyside, in his own "Sleepy Hollow," on the Hudson, near Tarrytown, where he died, 1859.

Irwin, Agnes, American educator, was born at Washington, D. C., 1841, daughter of William W. Irwin. She was educated in private schools; Litt. D., university of Pennsylvania, 1898; LL. D., St. Andrew's, Scotland, 1906. She first taught in the school of Mrs. Hoffman, New York, later conducted a private school in Philadelphia, and from 1894 to 1909 was dean of Radcliffe college, Cambridge, Mass.

Irwin, May, actress, was born at Whitby, Ontario, 1862, daughter of Robert E. Campbell. She made her début at the Adelphi theater, Buffalo, 1876; was a member of Tony Pastor's company, 1877–83, Augustin Daly's company, 1883–87; later with Charles Frohman, and Rich and Harris; subsequently starred in The Widow Jones; The Swell Miss Fitzwell; Courted Into Court; Kate Kip — Buyer; Sister Mary; Belle of Bridgeport; Madge Smith, Attorney; Mrs. Black is Back; Mrs. Wilson—Andrews; Mrs. Peckham's Carouse, etc. She married Frederick W. Keller, 1878, who died in 1886. Married Kurt Eisfeldt, 1907.

Irwin, Wallace, author, was born at Oneida, N. Y., 1875. He studied at Stanford university, 1896–99, and became a special writer on San Francisco Examiner, 1900; was editor San Francisco News Letter, 1901; editor Overland Monthly, 1902. Burlesque writer Republic theater, 1903; writer of topical verse, New York Globe, 1904-05, and on staff Collier's Weekly, 1906-07. Author: The Love Sonnets of a Hoodlum; The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, Jr.; Fairy Tales Up to Now; Nautical Lays of a Landsman; At the Sign of the Dollar; Chinatown Ballads; Random Rhymes of Odd Numbers, etc. He is a prolific contributor to magazines and weeklies.

Isabella (ĭz'-ȧ-bĕl'-ȧ), queen of Castile, daughter of John II., was born in 1451, and united in 1469 to Ferdinand V., king of Aragon. On the death of her brother, Henry IV., in 1474, she took possession of the throne of Castile, to the exclusion of Joanna, the true inheritor of the crown. When a union of the kingdoms of Aragon and Castile took place, Ferdinand and Isabella together assumed the royal title of Spain. She was a woman of fine intellect, a wise and humane ruler, was always present during the transaction of state business, and her name was placed beside that of the king in state ordinances. She proved also a stanch supporter of Columbus in his search for the western route to India. Died, 1504.

Isabey (ē'-zȧ'-bē'), Jean Baptiste, court painter and favorite of Napoleon, was born at Nancy, 1767. He was a pupil of Girardet, Claudet, Dumont, and David. He painted the portraits of Josephine, Napoleon, his marshals, and the chief personages of Europe. He visited the Russian court at the invitation of Alexander. Died at Paris, 1855.

Isaiah (ī-zā'-yȧ, ī-zä'-yȧ), one of the most eminent of the Hebrew prophets, flourished about 740–701 B. C. He was the son of Amoz, but of his personal history very little is known. He prophesied under Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah. His prophecies, though delivered later in point of time than several of those uttered by other prophets, occupy, in our Bible, the first place, both on account of their bulk, and for the sublimity and importance of the predictions.

Isidore (ĭz'-ĭ-dōr) of Seville, or Isidorus Hispalensis, one of the most distinguished ecclesiastics of the seventh century, was born at Cartagena, Spain, about 560. He is particularly remarkable as among the earliest representatives of the church of Spain, and of that great movement in the western church by which the doctrinal and moral system of Christianity was brought into harmony with the habits and institutions of those various races and nationalities which, by successive immigrations and wars, were eventually erected into the Hispano-Gothic kingdom, which exercised so powerful an influence on what is called Latin Christianity. The episcopate of Isidore, which began in 600, is rendered notable by the half-ecclesiastical, half-civil councils of Seville in 619, and of Toledo in 633, which were held under his presidency, and the canons of which may almost be said to have formed the basis of the constitutional law of the Spanish kingdoms, both for church and for state, down to the great constitutional changes of the fifteenth century. He also collected with the same object all the decrees of councils and other church laws anterior to his time. Died, 636.

Ismail Pasha (ĭs'-mä-ēl' pȧ-shä'), khedive of Egypt, was born in 1830. He succeeded Said Pasha as fifth viceroy of Egypt, 1863; promoted the Suez canal project, and gained wealth by the cultivation of cotton during the American war. The sultan settled the direct succession in his line in 1866, and his ambition afterward made him master of the upper and white Nile, Darfur, and surrounding territory. He almost rebuilt Cairo, greatly improved Alexandria, and constructed immense public works. Financial disaster coming in 1879, he abdicated in favor of his son, Mohammed Tewfik, and lived after 1888 in Constantinople. Died, 1895.

Isocrates (ī-sŏk'-ra-tēz), Greek orator and teacher, was born in Athens, 436 B. C. He received an excellent education, in his youth heard the orator Gorgias, and joined the circle of Socrates, but abandoned philosophy for speech-writing, which also he gave up when he found, after six speeches, that he had not the practical gifts for winning cases in a law court. About 390 B. C. he set up as a teacher of oratory, though he professed also to give a general practical education. He drew to him pupils subsequently distinguished as statesmen, historians, and orators. He himself composed model speeches for his pupils, such as the Panegyricus and the Platœicus. But he also wrote speeches intended to be practical; the Archidamus may actually have been composed for the Spartan king Archidamus. But the majority, for instance the Symmachicus, the Areopagiticus, the Panathenaicus, and the letters to Philip of Macedon, were designed to be circulated and read — they are in fact the earliest political pamphlets known. As a politician, Isocrates' one idea was to unite all Greeks together in a joint attack upon the common foe, Persia. The outcome was the destruction of Greek freedom at Chæronea by Philip, a blow which "killed with report that old man eloquent." For melody, artistic merit, perfection of form and literary finish, Isocrates stands unrivaled, though his work is labored and his style is apt to become monotonous. Died, 338 B. C.

Israels (ēs'-rä-ĕls'), Josef, Dutch painter, was born at Groningen, 1824. He studied at Amsterdam, under Kruseman, and next at Paris, under Picquet, and received gold medals of honor at Paris, Brussels, and Rotterdam. He also had conferred upon him the Belgian order of Leopold, and was nominated a member of the French legion of honor. Principal works: "Old and Worn-out"; "Silent Conversation"; "The Frugal Meal"; "Past Mother's Grave"; "Domestic Sorrow"; "The Eve of the Separation"; "From Darkness to Light"; "The Pancake"; "The Poor of the Village"; "The Shoemaker"; "A Cottage Madonna"; "The Tranquil House"; "The Cradle"; "Interior of the Orphans' Home at Katwyk"; "The True Support"; "The Mother"; "The Children of the Sea"; "Minding the Flock"; "The Little Sick Nurse"; "The Sower." Died, 1911.

Ito (ē'-tō), Marquis Hirobumi, Japanese statesman, was born in the province of Choshu, 1841. In 1871 he visited the United States for the purpose of examining the coinage system, and on his return to Japan was successful in establishing a mint at Osaka. In 1878 he was transferred from the office of minister of public works to that of minister of the interior. He became prominent in the Japanese cabinet in 1886, made many reforms, and in 1888 prepared the written constitution of Japan which was promulgated in 1889. In 1897-98 he made a tour of the United States and Europe. In the latter year he visited China to arrange an alliance between that country and his own, and, in 1900, on the resignation of the Yamagata ministry, he was summoned by the emperor to form a cabinet. He revisited the United States in 1901, and subsequently became the chief administrative officer of Corea. Assassinated, 1909.

Ito, Count Yuko, Japanese admiral, chief of the naval general staff, was born in Satsuma province, 1843. He was educated at the Tokyo Kaisei college. Entered the imperial Japanese navy, 1868; attained the rank of lieutenant-commander, 1872; commanded the Adzuma, Nisshin, Fuso, and Hiyei in succession; took part in the civil war of 1877 in command of Nisshin, and with the Hiyei went to the Persian gulf, 1880; was promoted rear-admiral and commander of the standing squadron, 1886; vice-admiral and chief of Yokosuka naval station, 1892; fought the battle of Yalu with all the combined squadrons under command, 1894; chief of the naval general staff, 1895; created viscount for services in the war, and made a full admiral in 1898.

Ivan III. (ē-vän′, ī′-văn), Vasilevitch, czar of Russia, sometimes named "the great," may be regarded as the founder of the Russian empire. He was born in 1440, was at first only grand-duke of Moscow, but succeeded in shaking off entirely the yoke of the Tartars, and in subjecting a number of the Russian principalities to his own sway. In 1472 he married Sophia, a niece of Constantine Palæologus, assumed the title of "ruler of all Russia," and adopted the two-headed eagle of the Byzantine empire. Died, 1505.

Ivan IV., Vasilevitch, czar of Russia, called "the terrible," was born in 1530. He did much for the advancement of his country in arts and commerce, as well as for its extension by arms. He subdued Kazan and Astrakhan, and made the first annexation of Siberia. He concluded a commercial treaty with Queen Elizabeth of England, after the English had discovered the way to Archangel by sea. But his hand fell with merciless cruelty upon the boyars of his kingdom, and upon some of his towns, as Moscow, Tver, and Novgorod. Ivan died of sorrow for his son, whom three years before he had slain in a mad fit of rage. Died, 1584.

Ives (īvz), Frederic Eugene, American inventor, was born at Litchfield, Conn., 1856. He was educated in the public schools at Litchfield, Norfolk, Newtown, Conn. In charge of photographic laboratory, Cornell university, 1874–78, he realized the first practically successful process of orthochromatic photography, and invented the process of half-tone photo-engraving now universally employed, 1886. His experiments in color photography on the so-called trichromatic principle, commenced in 1878, culminated in the three-color printing process in the typographic press, now an important industry, and in the Kromskop and Tripak systems. His recent inventions include glass sealed spectroscope gratings, the diffraction chromoscope, and the universal colorimeter. He has lectured before scientific societies in America and England, and is a member of many scientific societies. Author: Isochromatic Photography with Chorophyll, A New Principle in Heliochromy. Contributor to technical and educational journals on photographic processes.

Ixtlilxochitl (ēsh′-tlĭl-shō′-chēt′l), Fernando de Alva, Mexican antiquarian, was born in Mexico, about 1568. He was a descendant of the kings of Tezcuco, was interpreter of the native languages to several viceroys of Mexico, and a laborious collector of the ancient MSS. and traditions of his country. Both Prescott and Lord Kingsborough made use of his writings in the compilations of their histories. Many valuable manuscripts of his are in the archives of Mexico. Died, 1648.

Jackson, Abraham Valentine Williams, American educator and scholar, professor Indo-Iranian languages, Columbia university, since 1895, was born in New York, 1862. He was graduated at Columbia, 1883; L. H. D., 1885, Ph. D., 1886, LL. D., 1904. Was university student, Halle, Germany, 1887–89; instructor in Anglo-Saxon and Indo-Iranian languages, Columbia, 1889–91; adjunct professor English language and literature, Columbia, 1891–95, and has done much public lecturing. He traveled in India, 1901 and 1911, Persia and Central Asia, 1903, 1907, and 1910. Author: A Hymn of Zoroaster; An Avestan Grammar; An Avestan Reader; Zoroaster, the Prophet of Ancient Iran; Persia, Past and Present; and many articles in Journal American Oriental Society since 1886, and other journals of learning, magazines, etc. He edited A History of India, 9 vols., and the Columbia university Indo-Iranian series, in five volumes.

Jackson, Andrew, seventh president of the United States, was born in North Carolina, 1767. His father, a Scotch-Irishman, emigrated to America in 1765. When Jackson grew up he was sent to study for the church, but on the outbreak of the American revolution he and his brothers were summoned to the field. Though but thirteen years old, he fought under Sumter, and remained with the army until the end of the war. In 1784 he commenced the study of law, and in 1788 was appointed solicitor for the western district of South Carolina, now the state of Tennessee. In 1796 he was a member of the convention which modeled the constitution and organized the state of Tennessee, and was elected, respectively, representative, United States senator, judge of the state supreme court, and major-general of state militia. In 1813, at an outbreak of hostilities with the Creek Indians, he raised a volunteer force of 3,000 men and defeated them. Jackson's final victory on March 27, 1814, broke the power of the Indian race in North America. He was appointed major-general of the United States army; defended New Orleans against the attack of the British under General Packenham, December, 1814. The result of this action gave General Jackson a great and enduring popularity. After Spain had ceded Florida to the United States he was made governor of the territory, and subsequently was chosen United States senator from Tennessee. He was, in spite of opposition, elected president of the United States by the democratic party in 1828, and in 1832 reëlected by a still more overwhelming majority. His administration was marked by singular firmness. He vetoed important measures against large majorities, destroyed the bank of the United States, and took the first steps toward a specie currency and an independent treasury. He retired with undiminished popularity after witnessing the election of his favorite, President Van Buren. Died, 1845.

Jackson, Helen Hunt, American author and poet, was born in Amherst, Mass., 1831. Her maiden name was Helen Maria Fiske. She studied at Ipswich female seminary, and in 1852 was married to Major E. B. Hunt, of the United States engineers. She afterward married William S. Jackson, and lived most of the latter part of her life at Colorado Springs, Colo. She began to write verses about 1870 over the signature "H. H.," which soon became familiar to magazine readers. She had always been interested in the welfare of the Indians, and her book, A Century of Dishonor, made her their champion. In 1883 Mrs. Jackson was made a commissioner by the government to look into the condition of the Mission Indians of California. Her last book, Ramona, which deals with Indian life, leaped at once into great popularity. She died at San Francisco, 1885.

Jackson, Samuel Macaulay, American educator and writer, professor of church history, New York university, 1895–1912; was born in New York city, 1851. He was graduated from the college of the city of New York, 1870, Union theological seminary, 1873; LL. D., Washington and Lee university, 1892; D. D., New York university, 1893. He was a Presbyterian pastor, Norwood, N. J., 1876–80; assistant editor Schaff's Bible Dictionary, 1880; associate editor, Schaff-Herzog Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge, 1884; joint-editor, Encyclopædia of Living Divines, 1887; editor, Concise Dictionary of Religious Knowledge, 1891; church terms in the Standard Dictionary, 1895, and of the same in the supplement to Webster's International Dictionary, 1900; church history department, Johnson's Universal Cyclopædia, 1893–95; religious editor, New International Encyclopædia, 1902–04, and was chief editor of new edition of Schaff-Herzog Encyclopædia, 1907–11. His other publications include: Huldreich Zwingli, Handbooks for Practical Workers in Church and Philanthropy, etc. Died, 1912.

Jackson, Thomas Jonathan, better known the world over as "Stonewall Jackson," American general, was born in Lewis county, Virginia (now West Virginia), 1824. He was graduated at West Point academy in 1846, and after serving with distinction in the Mexican war, he became a professor in the military institute at Lexington, Va. At the outbreak of the civil war he was appointed brigadier-general in the confederate service. At the battle of Bull Run, July, 1861, his command on that occasion "stood like a stone wall," hence the sobriquet. In September he received the rank of major-general; defeated General Banks at Front Royal, 1862; fought an indecisive battle with Frémont at Cross Keys; commanded a corps in the battle of Gaines' Mill and Malvern Hill; again defeated General Banks at Cedar mountain; captured Harper's Ferry with 11,000 federal prisoners; commanded a corps at Antietam; and was made lieutenant-general for his services in largely contributing to the federal defeat at Fredericksburg. In 1863, by a clever flank movement, he defeated the 11th corps of General Hooker's army at Chancellorsville; and on the evening of the same day was fired at by a patrol party of his own men, who mistook him and his staff, in the darkness, for a detachment of Union cavalry, and died of his wounds on May 10, 1863.

Jacobi (Ger. yä-kō'-bē), Abraham, American physician, was born at Hartum, Westphalia, 1830. He studied at the universities of Greifswald and Göttingen; was graduated from Bonn, M. D., 1851; LL. D., university of Michigan, 1898, Columbia, 1900, Yale, 1905, Harvard, 1906. He became identified with German revolutionary movement; was held in detention at Berlin and Cologne, 1851–53, for "high treason," and settled in practice in New York, 1853; was professor of diseases of children, New York medical college, 1860–65, and at New York university, 1865–70; later professor of diseases of children, college of physicians and surgeons. He was co-editor of American Journal of Obstetrics and Diseases of Women and Children, 1868–71. Author: Dentition and Its Derangements; The Raising and Education of Abandoned Children in Europe; Infant Diet; Diphtheria; Treatise on Diphtheria; Pathology of the Thymus Gland; Therapeutics of Infancy and Childhood; Intestinal Diseases, etc. Member of many medical societies.

Jacobi, Friedrich Heinrich, German philosopher, was born at Düsseldorf, 1743. He was trained for a mercantile career, but in 1772 was appointed finance officer for Jülich and Berg, and devoted himself to literature and philosophy. He elaborated no system of philosophy, but criticised all other philosophies from his special doctrine — that by the "reason," not the understanding, we have immediate conviction or belief not only of the reality of objects perceived by the senses, but also of the reality of the highest verities that lie beyond the apprehension of sense. From this standpoint he examined Spinoza, Hume, Kant, and Schelling. He also expounded his view in philosophical romances — Woldemar and Allwills Briefsammlung—in an Open Letter to Fichte, and in other writings. Died, 1819.

Jacobi, Karl Gustav Jakob, celebrated German mathematician, was born in Prussia, 1804. In 1829 he became a professor at Königsberg, and published his celebrated work, Fundamenta nova Theoriæ Functionum Ellipticarum, for which he received the great medal of the academy of sciences of Paris. He also wrote a great number of memoirs on the different branches of the higher mathematics, chiefly on Series and Definite Integrals, and was a regular contributor to the celebrated Journal für reine und angewandt Mathematik of Crelle. Died, 1851.

Jacoby (ja-kō'-bĭ), Harold, American astronomer, professor of astronomy at Columbia university, since 1894, was born at New York, 1865. He was graduated at Columbia, 1885; Ph. D., same. Was assistant astronomer United States eclipse expedition to West Africa in United States steamer Pensacola, 1889–90; acting director, 1903–06, director since 1906, Columbia observatory. Author: Practical Talks by an Astronomer, technical papers on astronomical photography, stellar parallax and star clusters, published by leading European and American societies; also contributes articles on astronomical subjects to daily papers of principal cities. Public lecturer on astronomy and other subjects.

Jacotot (zhä'-kō'-tō'), Jean Joseph, inventor of the "universal method" of education, was born at Dijon, France, 1770. He was successively soldier, military secretary, and holder of various professional chairs. The principles of his system are that the mental capacities of all men are equal; the unequal results of education depend almost exclusively upon will; everyone is able to educate himself, provided he is once started in the right way; knowledge should first be acquired through instinctive experience, or by the memory. He expounded his views in Enseignement Universel. Died, 1840.

Jacquard (zhä'-kär'), Joseph Marie, French inventor, was born at Lyons, 1752. He attempted to establish a manufactory for weaving figured fabrics, planned several ingenious improvements in machinery, and brought to perfection the apparatus for figured weaving, which now perpetuates his name — the Jacquard loom. Among his contrivances may be mentioned also a machine for weaving nets for fishing. His machine was discovered, he was arrested, and sent to Paris; but upon examination the inspectors, Napoleon and Carnot being two of them, awarded him a gold medal. He resided at Lyons for many years, encountering much opposition from a prejudice excited against machinery, but eventually triumphed. He passed his latter years in tranquil retirement, and died in 1834. During his life he received the cross of the legion of honor, and in 1840 a public statue was erected to his memory at Lyons.

Jahn (yän), Friedrich Ludwig, the "Turnvater" or father of gymnastics, was born at Lanz in Prussia, 1778. In 1811 he started the first gymnasium in Berlin. His system, meant to revive patriotism, attracted the Prussian youth, and to the training thus obtained must be largely attributed the expulsion of the French. Jahn received the command of a volunteer corps; and after the peace of 1815 resumed his teaching, and published Die Deutsche Turnkunst. But the gymnasiums began to witness political gatherings, too liberal to please the Prussian government, and they were closed in 1818. Jahn, who had taken a prominent part in the movement, was arrested in 1819 and suffered five years' imprisonment. He was elected to the Frankfort national assembly in 1848. Died, 1852.

Jahn, Otto, German philologist, archæologist and classical editor, was born at Kiel, 1813. He lectured at Kiel, Greifswald, and Leipzig. Deprived of his chair in 1851 for his part in the political movements of 1848-49, he became in 1855 professor of archæology at Bonn. He published works on Greek art, representations of ancient life on vases, a number of Latin and Greek classics, besides a Life of Mozart, and a number of masterly essays on music. Died, 1869.

James I. of England, VI. of Scotland, the only son of Mary, queen of Scots, and Henry, Lord Darnley, was born in Edinburgh, 1566. When his mother was forced to resign the crown, James was proclaimed king of Scotland, 1567. The training of his childhood was under the care of the earl of Mar. His tutor was the famous scholar, George Buchanan. In 1578 the earl of Morton, then regent, was driven from power, and James assumed full control. The new government was unpopular, and Morton was once more made regent. He was at length condemned and executed, as one of the murderers of Lord Darnley. In the winter of 1589 James went to Denmark, where he married Princess Anne, daughter of Frederick II., king of that country. By the death of Elizabeth in 1603, James succeeded to the throne of England. He soon became unpopular with his new subjects. The anger of the Roman Catholics toward him, because of his severities, led to the famous gunpowder plot. He really governed through his favorites, Kerr and Buckingham, both of them unpopular; and England's prestige as a power, which had been gained under Elizabeth, soon disappeared. The so-called King James Bible was completed during his reign. He has been described as two men in one — "a witty, well-read scholar, who wrote, disputed and harangued, and a nervous, driveling idiot who acted." He has been called by one historian "the wisest fool in Christendom." Died, 1625.

James II. of England and VII. of Scotland, son of Charles I. and Henrietta Maria, was born in 1633. In 1648, during the civil war, he made his escape to France. For some time he served in the French army under Turenne; but on peace being made with Cromwell he was obliged to leave both the army and territory of Louis XIV. He then entered the military service of Spain. At the restoration he was made lord high admiral of England. On the death of Charles II., 1685, James succeeded to the crown without opposition. On becoming king he promised to maintain the church and to respect the liberties of the people, but his government, nevertheless, was arbitrary and tyrannical; he paraded his Catholicism, persecuted the covenanters, subordinated English interests to French, permitted the "bloody assize," suspended the test act, violated the rights of the universities, gave church offices to Roman Catholics, and by these and many other acts of despotism made his deposition necessary; leading statesmen invited William of Orange to assume the throne, and James fled to France; an invasion of Ireland in 1689 ended in his defeat at the battle of the Boyne. He retired again to France, and lived at St. Germains until his death, 1701.

James IV. of Scotland, son of James III. and Margaret of Denmark, was born in 1473. His rule gave promise of being both vigorous and popular, while the personal beauty he possessed and his open frankness won the hearts of his people. He exhibited great energy and good sense in the management of public affairs, in vindicating the law, and punishing crime, in encouraging shipbuilding, and in developing the agriculture and the manufactures of the country. In 1503 the king married Margaret, eldest daughter of Henry VII. of England, an alliance which led to the union of the two crowns just one hundred years later. Henry VIII. came to the English throne in 1509, and, in the disputes which followed, James invaded England with an army. He was met by the earl of Surrey, and in the battle which took place at Flodden, 1513, the king and many of his nobles were killed. He was forty years old, and had reigned twenty-six years.

James, Edmund Janes, American educator, was born in Jacksonville, Ill., 1855. He was educated at the Illinois state normal school and at the Northwestern and Harvard universities; Ph. James, George Payne Rainsford, English historical novelist, was born in London, 1801. He was educated at Putney and in France, and by seventeen had written some Eastern tales, which found favor with Washington Irving. Thereafter he ceased to write, dictating instead to an amanuensis his "thick-coming fancies." In all he published seventy-seven works, historical romances mostly, but also biographies, poems, etc. The best were among the earliest: Richelieu and Henry Masterton. He was British consul at Richmond, Va., 1852-56, and then at Venice until his death in 1860.

James, Henry, American author, was born in New York, 1843. He was educated in France and Switzerland, and at Harvard law school. He began his literary career as contributor to periodicals, 1866, and since 1869 has lived in England. Jameson (jām'-sun), Mrs. (Anna Brownell Murphy), British writer, was born in Dublin, 1794. She was the daughter of an artist, and many of her books are about pictures, painters, and other art matters. In 1823 she married Robert Jameson, and went with him to Canada, where he held a government office. The marriage was not a happy one, and she separated from her husband, and gave herself up to writing. Among her books are: Memoirs of Celebrated Female Sovereigns; Characteristics of Women; Memoirs of Italian Painters; The History of Sacred and Legendary Art; and Legends of the Madonna. She died in London, 1860.

Jameson, John Franklin, American educator, historian, was born in Boston, 1859. He graduated at Amherst college, 1879; Ph. D., Johns Hopkins, 1882, LL. D., 1902; LL.D., Amherst, 1898; was assistant and associate professor of history, Johns Hopkins, 1882–88; professor of history, Brown, 1888–1901; head of department of history, university of Chicago, 1901–05, and director department of historical research, Carnegie institution, Washington, since 1905. He was managing editor of American Historical Review, 1895–1901 and since 1905; president American historical association, 1906–07. Author: Willem Usselinx, Founder of the Dutch and Swedish West India Companies; History of Historical Writing in America; Dictionary of United States History, etc. He edited the Correspondence of John C. Calhoun, and has been editor of historical publications of Carnegie institution since 1905.

Jameson, Rt. Hon. Sir Leander Starr, South African politician, was born at Edinburgh, 1853. He studied medicine there and at London, and began practice at Kimberley in 1878. Through Cecil Rhodes he engaged in pioneer work, was in 1891 made administrator of the South African company at Fort Salisbury, and won enormous popularity. During the troubles at Johannesburg between the Uitlanders and the Boer government, Jameson, who by order of Rhodes had concentrated the military forces of Rhodesia at Mafeking on the Transvaal frontier, started with six hundred troopers to support the Uitlanders, 1895. At Doornkoop they were overpowered by an overwhelming force of Boers, and, sleepless and famishing, were compelled after a sharp fight to surrender, January 2, 1896. Handed over to the British authorities, Jameson was in May condemned in London to fifteen months' imprisonment, but was released in December. In 1900 he was elected to the legislative assembly, and was, from 1904 to 1908, premier of Cape Colony. Member of parliament, Harbor division, Cape Town, 1910–12. Created baronet, 1911.

Janet (zhȧ'-nĕ'), Paul, French philosopher, was born in Paris, 1823. He was professor at Bourges, Strassburg, the Lycée of Louis-le-Grand, Paris, and finally, in 1864, he became professor of the history of philosophy at the Sorbonne, and a member of the academy of moral and political sciences. Among his works are: Histoire de la Science Politique; Les Problèmes du XIX. Siècle; Philosophie de la Révolution Française; Les Causes Finales; La Philosophie Française Contemporaine; Les Maîtres de la Pensée Moderne; etc. He also contributed to the Revue des Deux Mondes, Dictionnaire des Sciences Philosophiques Le Temps, etc., and was an officer of the legion of honor. Died, 1899.

Janeway (jān'-wā), Edward Gamaliel, American physician, was born in New Jersey, 1841; graduated at Rutgers college, 1860; acting medical cadet, United States army hospital, Newark, N. J., 1862–63; graduated at the college of physicians and surgeons, New York, 1864; LL. D. From 1864 he was in practice in New York; identified with the Bellevue hospital medical college after 1868, first as curator, in 1872 as professor of pathological anatomy, and later as professor of medicine and dean. He held many hospital appointments. and was health commissioner of New York, 1875–82. Died, 1911.

Jansen (jăn'-sen; D., yăn'-sen), Cornelius, sometimes called Jansenius, bishop of Ypres, in the Netherlands, and founder of the Jansenists, was born at Acquoi, near Leerdam in Holland, 1585. He studied at Utrecht, Louvain, and Paris; filled a chair at Bayonne; and in 1630 became professor of theology at Louvain. In 1636 he was made bishop of Ypres. He died in 1638, just as he had completed his great work, the Augustinus, in 4 vols., which sought to prove that the teaching of St. Augustine against the Pelagians and semi-Pelagians on grace, free-will, and predestination was directly opposed to the teaching of the Jesuit schools. Jansen repudiated the ordinary Catholic dogma of the freedom of the will, and refused to admit merely sufficient grace, maintaining that inferior grace is irresistible, and that Christ died for all. On the publication of the Augustinus in 1640, it was received with loud clamor, especially by the Jesuits, and was prohibited by a decree of the inquisition in 1641; in the following year it was condemned by Urban VIII. in the bull In Eminenti. Jansen was supported by such writers as Arnauld, Pascal, and the Port-royalists. The controversy raged in France with more or less violence for nearly a century, when a large number of Jansenists emigrated to the Netherlands.

Jastrow (yäs'-trō), Joseph, American educator, professor of psychology, university of Wisconsin, since 1903, was born at Warsaw, Poland, 1863. He was graduated at the university of Pennsylvania, 1882; Ph. D., Johns Hopkins, 1886. He was in charge of the psychological section of World's Columbian exposition, 1893, and president of American psychological association, 1900. Author: Time-Relations of Mental Phenomena; Epitomes of Three Sciences, part author; Fact and Fable in Psychology; The Subconscious, etc., and a frequent contributor on psychological subjects in scientific journals and magazines.

Jastrow, Morris, Jr., American orientalist, professor of Semitic languages, and librarian, university of Pennsylvania, was born in Europe, 1861. He was graduated at the university of Pennsylvania, 1881; Ph. D., university of Leipzig, 1884, and also studied at other universities of Germany and France. He is a recognized authority on Semitic religions, languages, and literatures. Author: Religion of the Babylonians and Assyrians; The Study of Religion; etc. Editor, with memoir, Selected Essays of James Darmesteter, translated by Helen Bachman Jastrow; series of Handbooks on the History of Religion, and of the Semitic department of the International Encyclopædia. He was also a contributor to Hastings's Dictionary of the Bible; the Encyclopædia Biblica; Jewish Encyclopædia; Encyclopædia Britannica; Hastings's Dictionary of Religions; Journal American Oriental Society, and various other technical publications.

Jay, John, American statesman and jurist, was born in New York city, 1745, and was there admitted to the bar in 1768. In 1774, as a member of the first continental congress, he formed one of the committee of three which drew up the celebrated address to the people of Great Britain. He largely assisted in framing the New York state constitution, in 1777 was appointed chief-justice of New York, and in the following year became president of congress. He next took part in negotiating the treaty of peace entered into at Paris, 1783, between Great Britain and the United States. On his return he was appointed secretary of foreign affairs, and in 1789 chief-justice of the United States supreme court. In 1794 he proceeded on a special mission to England, where he concluded a treaty which met with violent opposition from the anti-federalist party. He afterward held the governorship of New York state, and, after refusing a second nomination to the chief-justiceship, died, 1829.

Jebb, Sir Richard Claverhouse, British Greek scholar, was born at Dundee, Scotland, 1841. He was graduated from Trinity college, Cambridge, as senior classic in 1862, and was elected fellow. He took a prominent part in organizing inter-collegiate classical lectures, and was secretary to the newly-founded Cambridge philological society. In 1869 he became public orator of the university, in 1875 professor of Greek at Glasgow, and in 1889 regius professor of Greek at Cambridge. In 1891 he was elected member of parliament for Cambridge university. His books include Characters of Theophrastus; The Attic Orators; Primer of Greek Literature; Modern Greece; Translations into Greek and Latin Verse; Richard Bentley; Introduction to Homer; Erasmus; Influence of Classical Greek Poetry; and his Bacchylides. But his greatest work is his translation of Sophocles. Died, 1905.

Jeejeebhoy (jē-jēb-hoi'), Sir Jamsetjee, Hindu philanthropist, was born at Bombay, India, 1783. He was taken into partnership by his father-in-law, a Bombay merchant, in 1800. When peace was restored in Europe in 1815 Indian trade with Europe increased enormously. By 1822 he had amassed 2,000,000 pounds, and began to exhibit a magnificent liberality. He contributed generously to various educational and philanthropic institutions in Bombay, and spent upward of a quarter of a million pounds in benevolence. Parsee and Christian, Hindu and Mussulman were alike the objects of his beneficence. Queen Victoria knighted him in 1842, and in 1857 he was made a baronet. Died, 1859.

Jefferson, Charles Edward, Congregational clergyman, was born at Cambridge, Ohio, 1860. He was graduated at Ohio Wesleyan university, 1882, school of theology, Boston university, 1887; D. D., Oberlin, 1898, Union, 1898, Yale, 1903. He was ordained to the Congregational ministry, 1887; now pastor of Broadway tabernacle, New York. Author: Quiet Talks with Earnest People in My Study; Quiet Hints to Growing Preachers in My Study; Doctrine and Deed; Things Fundamental; The Minister as Prophet; Faith and Life; The World's Christmas Tree; The Old Year and the New; The New Crusade, etc.

Jefferson, Joseph, American actor, was born at Philadelphia, Pa., 1829. He came from a family of actors, and made his first appearance as a child in Pizarro. From 1856 to 1858 he played minor parts, and managed several theaters in the South, meanwhile visiting London. Shortly after he made his first substantial success as Dr. Pangloss in The Heir at Law, at New York. He toured Australia and New Zealand, 1861–65, returned by way of London, and played an engagement at the Adelphi theater in that city in an adaptation of Rip Van Winkle. He presented the same play in New York, 1866, and confined himself almost solely to it for fifteen years. In 1880 he produced The Rivals with himself as Bob Acres, and in the two last-named characters his great reputation was made on the American stage. He published his Autobiography in 1890, and made his last appearance at Paterson, N. J., 1904. He died at Palm Beach, Fla., 1905.

Jefferson, Thomas. See page 479.

Jeffrey, Francis, Lord, Scottish critic and jurist was born at Edinburgh, 1773. He studied at Glasgow and Oxford, and in 1794 was admitted to the Scottish bar, but as a whig made little progress for many years. In the trials for sedition, 1817–22, he acquired a great reputation; in 1820 and again in 1823 he was elected lord rector of Glasgow university; in 1829 dean of the faculty of advocates. In 1830 he was elected to parliament for Perth, and on the formation of Earl Grey's ministry became lord advocate. After the passing of the reform bill he was returned for Edinburgh, which he represented until 1834, when he was made a judge of the court of sessions. From 1815 he lived at Craigcrook, where he died in 1850. It is as literary critic and leader in a new departure in literary enterprise that Jeffrey holds his title to fame. Together with Sydney Smith, Francis Horner, and a few others, he established the Edinburgh Review, of which he was editor until 1829. His own contributions were very numerous and brilliant, if biased. A selection of them was published in 1844.

Jeffreys, George, Baron, English judge, was born at Acton near Wrexham, 1648, and was called to the bar in 1668. He rose rapidly, and became in 1671 common sergeant of the city of London. Hitherto nominally a Puritan, he now began to intrigue for court favor, was made solicitor to the duke of York, was knighted in 1677, and became recorder of London in 1678. Actively concerned in the popish plot prosecutions, he was made chief-justice of Chester and king's sergeant in 1680, baronet in 1681, and chief-justice of king's bench, 1683. His first exploit was the judicial murder of Algernon Sidney, but in every state-trial he proved subservient to the crown, thus earning the favor of James, who raised him to the peerage in 1685. Among his earliest trials were those of Titus Oates and Richard Baxter; later he was sent to try the followers of Monmouth, and hanged 331, transported 849 to the American plantations, and whipped or fined thirty-three others. He was lord chancellor from 1685 until the downfall of James, and supported all the king's measures as president of the newly-revised court of high commission, and in the trial of the seven bishops. On James's flight he tried to follow his example, but was caught at Wapping, disguised as a sailor, and sent to the Tower to save him from the mob. Here he died in 1689.

Jelliffe, Smith Ely, American physician, was born in New York, 1866. He was graduated at the Brooklyn polytechnic, 1886; medical department of Columbia university, 1889; Ph. D., Columbia, 1899. He began practice, 1889, spent one year in Europe, and since 1895 has practiced in New York. He is professor of mental diseases at Fordham university; visiting neurologist to the city hospital; and an authority in mental and nervous diseases. Author: Essentials of Vegetable Pharmacognosy, with Dr. H. H. Rusby; Morphology and Histology of Plants, with same; Nervous Diseases in Butler's Diagnostics; Outlines of Pharmacognosy; reviser of: May's Physiology; Butler's Materia Medica; Shaw on Nervous Diseases. Editor and translator: Dubois' Psychoneuroses; co-editor: Encyclopedia Americana; managing editor: Journal of Nervous and Mental Disease; contributor to medical, botanical, and pharmaceutical press.

Jenkin, Henry Charles Fleeming, British engineer and electrician, was born in England, 1833. Educated at Edinburgh and at the university of Genoa, Italy. Later he entered Fairbairn's shops at Manchester, and took a practical course in mechanics and engineering. In 1859 he began experiments in conjunction with Sir William Thomson (Lord Kelvin) in electricity, and was specially occupied with practical work in cable telegraphy, 1858–73. He was made fellow of the royal society, 1865, became professor of engineering in University college, London, same year, and in 1868 professor at Edinburgh university. He published Magnetism and Electricity, Miscellaneous Papers, etc. Died, 1885.

Jenks, Jeremiah Whipple, American economist and educator, professor of political economy and politics, Cornell, 1891-1912, professor of economics and finance, New York university, since 1912, was born in St. Clair, Mich., 1856. He was graduated from the university of Michigan, 1878; LL. D., 1903; Ph. D., university of Halle, 1885. Studied law, and was admitted to the Michigan bar. Taught Greek, Latin, and German at Mt. Morris college; professor of political science and English literature, Knox college, 1886–89; professor of political economy and social science, Indiana university, 1889–91; expert agent of United States industrial commission on investigation of trusts and industrial combinations in the United States and Europe, 1899–1901; and consulting expert of United States department of labor on same subject. Special commissioner of war department, United States, to investigate questions of currency, labor, internal taxation and police in the Orient, 1901-02. Appointed financial adviser to Chinese republic, 1912. Author: The Trust Problem; Report on Certain Economic Questions in the English and Dutch Colonies in the Orient. Editor and part author: Trusts and Industrial Combinations. Compiler: Statutes and Digested Decisions of Federal, State, and Territorial Law Relating to Trusts and Industrial Combinations. Part author and compiler of Reports of Commission on International Exchange, etc., and frequent contributor to periodical literature on economic and political questions. He was special expert on currency reform to the government of Mexico; member of the United States commission on international exchange in special charge of reform of currency in China, and since 1907 a member of the United States immigration commission.

Jenner (jĕn'-ĕr), Edward, English physician, discoverer of vaccination, was born at Berkeley vicarage, Gloucestershire, 1749. He was apprenticed to a surgeon at Sodbury, in 1770 went to London to study under John Hunter, and in 1773 settled at Berkeley, where he acquired a large practice. In 1775 he began to investigate the truth of the traditions respecting cow-pox, became convinced that it was efficacious as a protection against small-pox, and was led to hope that he would be able "to propagate it from one human being to another, until he had disseminated the practice over all the globe, to the total extinction of small-pox." Many investigations delayed the actual discovery of the prophylactic power of vaccination, and the crowning experiment was made on May 14, 1796. This experiment was followed by many others; and in 1798 Jenner published his Inquiry into the Causes and Effects of the Variolæ Vaccinæ. Yet the practice met with violent opposition for a year, when upward of seventy of the principal physicians and surgeons in London signed a declaration of their entire confidence in it. Jenner's discovery was soon promulgated throughout the civilized world. Honors were conferred upon him, and he was elected an honorary member of nearly all the learned societies of Europe. Parliament voted him in 1802 a grant of 10,000 pounds, and in 1807 a second grant of 20,000 pounds. He died at Berkeley, 1823.

Jeremiah, one of the four great prophets of Israel, author of the book in the Bible which bears his name, and of the book of Lamentations, flourished about 629–580 B. C. The writings of this prophet, dictated by him to Baruch, although arranged with little regard to order, exhibit great tenderness and elegiac beauty of sentiment, but lack the sublime grandeur of Isaiah. He often borrows from his poetic predecessors. Several of the Psalms have been attributed to him, especially by modern critics. Hitzig numbers thirty-four, which he believes to be the composition of Jeremiah. There is no reason to doubt that the Lamentations are properly ascribed to him, while the apocryphal work of his, mentioned by Jerome, deserves little notice.

Jeroboam (jĕr-ō-bō'-am), first king of the divided kingdom of Israel, ruled about 937–915 B. C. He was made by Solomon superintendent of the labors and taxes exacted from his tribe of Ephraim at the construction of the fortifications of Zion. The growing disaffection toward Solomon fostered his ambition; but he was obliged to flee to Egypt. After Solomon's death he headed the successful revolt of the northern tribes against Rehoboam, and, as their king, established idol shrines at Dan and Bethel to wean away his people from the pilgrimages to Jerusalem. He reigned twenty-two years.

Jerome (jē-rōm'), Jerome Klapka, English humorist, writer, and lecturer, was born at Walsall, England, 1859. He has been at various times clerk, school-master, actor, and journalist; editor of Idler, with Robert Barr, 1892–97, and of To-Day, 1893–97. Author: On the Stage and Off; Idle Thoughts of an Idle Fellow; Three Men in a Boat; Diary of a Pilgrimage; Novel Notes; John Ingerfield; Barbara; Fennel; Sunset; New Lamps for Old; Ruth; Wood Barrow Farm; Prude's Progress; Rise of Dick Halward; Sketches in Lavender; Letters to Clorinda; The Second Thoughts of an Idle Fellow; Three Men on the Bummel; Miss Hobbs; Paul Kelver; Tea Table Talk; Tommy and Co.; Idle Ideas in 1905; Susan in Search of a Husband; Passing of the Third Floor Back; The Angel and the Author, etc.

Jerome of Prague, the friend of Huss, was born at Prague between 1360 and 1370. He studied at Oxford, became a convert there to Wycliffe's doctrines, and zealously taught them after his return home in 1407. The king of Poland employed him to reorganize the university of Cracow in 1410; the king of Hungary invited him to preach before him at Budapest. Jerome entered with his whole soul into the contest carried on by Huss. When Huss was arrested at Constance, Jerome hastened to his side to defend him, but, being refused a safe-conduct, he set out to return to Prague, was arrested in Bavaria, 1415, and was brought back to Constance. He recanted, but withdrew his recantation, and went to the stake, 1416.

Jerome, Saint, Sophronius Eusebius Hieronymus, was born at Stridon Dalmatia, at some period between 331 and 345. He studied Greek and Latin, rhetoric and philosophy under Ælius Donatus at Rome, where he was also admitted to the right of baptism. After a residence in Gaul he seems to have revisited Rome; but in the year 370 he had settled in Aquileia with his friend Rufinus, and retired in 374 to the desert of Chalcis, where he spent four years in penitential exercises and in study, especially of the Hebrew language. In 379 he was ordained and went in 382 to Rome, where he resided until 385, as secretary of the pope Damascus, and where, although already engaged in his great work of the revision of the Latin version of the Bible, he attained to great popularity and influence by his sanctity, learning, and eloquence. Many pious persons placed themselves under his spiritual direction, the most remarkable of whom were Lady Paula and her daughter Eustochium. These ladies followed him to the holy land, whither he returned in 385. He permanently fixed his residence at Bethlehem in 386, Lady Paula having founded three convents and a monastery, the latter governed by Jerome himself. His conflict with the Pelagians rendering even his life insecure at Bethlehem, he was compelled to go into concealment for over two years; and soon after his return to Bethlehem, in 418, he was seized with a lingering illness, which terminated in his death, 420. He is universally regarded as the most learned and eloquent of the Latin fathers.

Jerome, William Travers, American lawyer, was born at New York, 1859. He was educated at Williston seminary and Amherst college; was graduated at Columbia law school, 1884; admitted to the bar, 1884. He was justice of special sessions, 1895–1902. Elected district attorney, New York county, 1901, and reëlected as independent candidate, 1905. During his career as district attorney he appeared in many noted trials, and attained a high rank as a lawyer and pleader. Author: Liquor Tax Law in New York.

Jerrold (jĕr′-uld), Douglas William, English journalist, author, and wit, was born in London, 1803. He was in the main self-educated, served as a midshipman in the royal navy, and about 1821 produced a successful comedy. He is chiefly remembered, however, for his contributions to Punch, with which he was connected from 1841 until within a short time of his death. His best play is Black-eyed Susan, published in 1829; his best novels are St. Giles and St. James, and The Chronicles of Clovernook. The most popular of his works, however, is Mrs. Caudle's Curtain Lectures, originally published in Punch. An edition of his Works was published during his lifetime; and his Life and Remains was edited by his son, Blanchard Jerrold, about a year after the father's death in 1857.

Jerrold, William Blanchard, son of Douglas Jerrold, was born in London, 1826. He was a writer for many of the principal newspapers of London, and wrote also many plays, novels, books of travel, and other works. Among his best books are Trips through the Vineyards of Spain; The Story of Madge and the Fairy Content; London, illustrated by Doré, and Life of Napoleon III. He died in 1884.

Jevons (jĕv′-unz), Frank Byron, English classical writer, subwarden, 1902–09, professor philosophy since 1910, Durham university; was born in 1858. He was graduated at Wadham college, Oxford, and was university treasurer, 1898–1902. Author: The Development of the Athenian Democracy; A History of Greek Literature; The Prehistoric Antiquities of the Aryan Peoples; Plutarch's Romane Questions; A Manual of Greek Antiquities; An Introduction to the History of Religion; Religion in Evolution, etc.

Jevons, William Stanley, English economist and logician, was born in Liverpool, 1835. He studied there and at University college, London. He was assayer to Sydney, Australia, mint, 1854–59, in 1866 became professor of logic and political economy at Owens college, Manchester, and in 1876–81 held the chair of political economy at University college, London. He was drowned in 1882 while bathing at Bexhill, near Hastings. He popularized the mathematical methods of Boole, and wrote Elementary Lessons in Logic; Principles of Science; Studies in Deductive Logic; Theory of Political Economy; Pure Logic and other Minor Works.

Jewett, Sarah Orne, American author, was born at South Berwick, Me., 1849, daughter of the late Dr. Theodore H. Jewett. She was educated at Berwick academy; Litt. D., Bowdoin college. Author: Deephaven; Play Days; Old Friends and New; Country By-Ways; The Mate of the Daylight and Friends Ashore; A Country Doctor; A Marsh Island; A White Heron, and Other Stories; The Story of the Normans; The King of Folly Island, and Other People; Betty Leicester — A Story for Girls; Strangers and Wayfarers; A Native of Winby, and Other Tales; The Life of Nancy; The Country of the Pointed Firs; Betty Leicester's English Christmas; The Queen's Twin; The Tory Lover, etc. She traveled extensively in the United States, West Indies, and Europe. Died, 1909.

Joan of Arc (jō-ăn′; jōn uv ärk′), or Jeanne d'Arc, the maid of Orleans, French national heroine, was born of poor but devout parents, in the village of Domremy, 1412. Her religious faith was ardent almost from her cradle. During that unhappy time of national degradation a prophecy, ascribed to Merlin, was current in Lorraine, that the kingdom lost by a woman — Queen Isabella — should be saved by a virgin, and no doubt this together with her visions helped to define her mission to the brooding and enthusiastic mind of the young peasant girl. She put on male dress and a suit of white armor, mounted a black charger, bearing a banner of her own device. Her sword was one that she divined would be found buried behind the altar in the church of St. Catharine de Fierbois. Thus equipped she put herself at the head of an army of 6,000 men, dictated a letter to the English, and advanced to aid Dunois in the relief of Orleans. Her arrival fired the fainting hearts of the French with a new enthusiasm, and, on April 29, 1429, she threw herself into the city, and, after fifteen days of fighting, the English were compelled to raise the siege and retreat. At once the face of the war was changed, the French spirit again awoke, and within a week the enemy were swept from the principal positions on the Loire. But all thoughts of self were lost in devotion to her mission, and now, with resistless enthusiasm, she urged on the weak-hearted dauphin to his coronation. On May 24, 1430, with a handful of men she forced her way into Compiègne, which was then besieged by the forces of Burgundy; was left behind by her men, taken prisoner, and sold to the English by John of Luxembourg. In December she was carried to Rouen, the headquarters of the English, heavily fettered and flung into a gloomy prison, and at length she was arraigned before the spiritual tribunal of Pierre Cauchon. Her trial was long, and was disgraced by every form of shameful brutality. She was burned at the stake on May 30, 1431.

John, Saint, the apostle, was born about 4 A. D., and was one of the earliest of Christ's disciples. During the crucifixion our Lord commended His mother to his care, and the apostle "took her to his own home." John afterward became bishop of Ephesus. According to Tertullian, he was plunged into a caldron of boiling oil during the persecution under Domitian, but received no injury. He was subsequently exiled to the island of Patmos, where he is said to have written the book of Revelation. He was also author of the gospel and epistles which bear his name. Died about 99.

John the Baptist, forerunner of Christ, was the son of the priest Zacharias and Elizabeth, the cousin of Mary, mother of our Lord. He was baptized and preached repentance and forgiveness of sins. When he had baptized Jesus, the office of the forerunner ceased. He had denounced Herod Antipas for taking Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, was flung into prison, where he was executed at the request of Salome, daughter of Herodias.

John II., Casimir, king of Poland, was born in 1609, the younger son of Sigismund III. Having embarked for Spain for the purpose of persuading Philip III. to form a league against France, he was shipwrecked, and imprisoned for two years at Vincennes. Being released on a promise given by his brother, king of Poland, never to wage war against France, he traveled through western Europe, became a Jesuit, and was made cardinal by Innocent X. Returning to Poland he succeeded his brother Ladislas in 1648, and married his widow, Maria Luisa Gonzaga. During his reign Poland was attacked by Russia and Sweden, resulting in wars which terminated in the cession of several provinces on the Baltic and Dnieper. His wife intriguing for the son of the prince of Condé as successor to the throne, and the nobles contending among themselves, he abdicated at the diet of Warsaw, 1668, and retired to France, where he was kindly received by Louis XIV. Died, 1672.

John III., Sobieski, king of Poland, was born about 1624. He was sent to Paris to complete his education, and entered the musketeers of Louis XIV. under Condé; but in 1648 he returned to combat the revolted Cossacks. He fought bravely against them and against the Swedish and other invaders, and next to Czarniecki he was foremost in saving the country from ruin. Shortly before the abdication of John Casimir he received the chief command of the army. In 1672 he defeated the Turks and Tartars, and when King Michael, being besieged by the Turks in Kamenetz, concluded an ignominious treaty, he caused its rejection by the senate, hastened to Podolia, and routed the Turks at Khotin, 1673. The king had died a few days before, and Sobieski was elected his successor in 1674. He resumed the war, and rescued the fortress of Trembowla, but subsequently, at Zurawno, barely escaped surrender. In 1683 he hastened to the rescue of Vienna, which was besieged by an army of 300,000 Turks. The Poles, numbering about one-tenth as many, were joined by a somewhat larger body of German troops. Scarcely had they arrived before Vienna when Sobieski gave the signal for attack. The Turks were driven within their intrenchments, and attacked there on the next day. The charge was terrible, and after a short struggle the Turks were completely routed. Sobieski, after a triumphal entry into Vienna, pursued the enemy into Hungary, which was soon restored to the emperor. He afterward made attempts to conquer Wallachia, but failed. The last years of his life were embittered by civil as well as domestic troubles. Died, 1696.

John, king of England, surnamed Lackland, was born in 1167. He was the youngest son of Henry II., and the successor, in 1199, of Richard I., his brother. He had several wars with Philip II. of France, who espoused the cause of Arthur, the son of Geoffrey, John's deceased elder brother, and the rightful heir to the throne. In 1203 he murdered his nephew Arthur at Rouen, and imprisoned Arthur's sister Eleanor, known as the damsel of Brittany, in Bristol castle. In 1207 Pope Innocent III. appointed Stephen Langton to the archbishopric of Canterbury, but John refused to sanction the nomination; whereupon the pontiff laid England under an interdict in 1208, excommunicated John, and absolved the people from their allegiance to the king in 1212, and authorized Philip of France to dethrone him. Terrified at this, John yielded to the pope, and swore that he would hold his kingdom as the pope's vassal, paying an annual tribute. In 1215, on the demand of his barons, who were headed by Stephen Langton, now archbishop of Canterbury, he signed Magna Charta. Though John thus accepted the charter which has been solemnly ratified on thirty-eight different occasions by subsequent kings, yet he had no intention of being bound by it. He actually procured from the pope a bull annulling the charter, and introduced foreign soldiers to fight against the barons, who immediately offered the throne to Louis, son of Philip of France, an offer which was readily accepted, but which led to no result. In the following year, while the king was marching into Lincolnshire, he had the misfortune to lose all his baggage in crossing the Welland, and died a few days later, of acute fever, in the castle of Newark, on the Trent. He was succeeded by his son, Henry III. During this reign the English lost nearly all their French possessions, even Normandy falling to the crown of France. Died, 1216.

John II., king of France, surnamed "the good," the second son of the Valois family, was born in 1319. He succeeded his father, Philip VI. of Valois, in 1350. He commenced his reign by acts of despotism and cruelty. England, being appealed to by the friends of those whom he had slain, invaded France, when John was defeated by Edward, the black prince, at Poitiers in 1356, and carried to Bordeaux and then to London, where he was a prisoner for three years. His ransom, by a treaty with Edward III. at Bretigny, was the surrender to the English of eight of the best French provinces and the payment of an immense sum in gold. His son, the duke of Anjou, who had been left in London as a hostage for the fulfilment of the treaty, escaped in violation of his parole, and John voluntarily returned as a prisoner to London in 1364, where he suddenly died in that year.

John, king of Saxony, was born in 1801. He was the youngest son of Duke Maximilian of Saxony and Princess Carolina of Parma. He was commander of the national guard, 1831–46. His brother, Frederick Augustus II., dying without issue, in 1854, he became king. In the war of 1866 he took the side of Austria. The Prussians entered Saxony, and the Saxon army, having withdrawn to Bohemia, fought against them in the battle of Königgrätz. Peace was concluded between Prussia and Saxony, and the king agreed to pay a large sum, and to cede the fortress of Königstein. Subsequently Saxony entered the North German confederation, and her troops took part in the Franco-Prussian war of 1870-71. Under the pseudonym Philalethes, John published a translation of Dante's Divina Commedia, with critical and historical notes, and left manuscript translations of seventy English poems. Died, 1873.

John of Austria, or Don Juan d'Austria, natural son of the emperor Charles V., was born at Regensburg, about 1547. He was early taken to Spain, and after the death of his father was acknowledged by his half-brother Philip II. In 1570 he was sent with an army against the Moors in Granada, whom he completely expelled from the country. In 1571, with the fleets of Spain, the pope, and Venice, he defeated the Turks in the great sea-fight of Lepanto. In 1573 he took Tunis, and conceived the scheme of forming a kingdom for himself. But Philip, jealous of this design, sent him to Milan, and in 1576 as viceroy to the Netherlands. He sought to win the favor of the people by mildness; hard pressed for a time by William the Silent, he with the help of Parma's troops won the victory of Gembloux in 1578. But Philip now feared he might make himself king of the Netherlands, and Don John's death at Namur, 1578, was not without suspicion of poison.

John of Gaunt (gänt; gônt), or Ghent, fourth son of Edward III., who made him duke of Lancaster, was born in 1340, at Ghent. In the French wars he served with great bravery under his brother, Edward, the black prince. In 1359 he married Blanche, heiress of the duke of Lancaster, and himself became duke in 1362. In 1371 he married Constance, daughter of Peter the Cruel, king of Castile. On the death of Peter, John claimed the kingdom in the name of his wife, but the military expedition organized to obtain the throne of Castile proved unsuccessful. Toward the end of his father's reign he became the chief man in the kingdom, and perhaps wished to succeed him; at any rate, the young king, Richard II., distrusted him and sent him on another wild expedition to recover his Castilian kingdom. This resulted in a treaty between John and Henry Trastamara, who had possession of the throne, by which John's daughter Catharine should succeed as queen of Castile. On the death of his second wife, he married Catharine Swynford, by whom he had already had three sons and a daughter. From the eldest child Henry VII. was descended. John of Gaunt died at London, 1399.

John of Salisbury, English schoolman, by Bishop Stubbs styled "for thirty years the central figure of English learning," was born at Old Sarum, about 1118. He studied at Paris and Chartres, and from 1150 lived at Canterbury, meanwhile often visiting Italy. From 1164 to 1170 he had to take refuge at Rheims, but he returned in time to witness Becket's murder. In 1176 he became bishop of Chartres. His Latin works include over 300 letters, the Policraticus, etc. Died, 1180.

John XXII., pope, otherwise Jacques d'Use, was born at Cahors, France, about 1244. Attempting, after his election as pope in 1316, to carry out the vast policy of Gregory VII., he interposed his authority in the contest for the imperial crown between Louis of Bavaria and Frederick of Austria, supporting the latter and excommunicating his rival. A long contest ensued both in Germany and Italy, where the Guelph or papal party was represented by Robert, king of Naples, and the Ghibelline by Frederick of Sicily. The latter was also excommunicated by John; but in 1327 Louis entered Italy, and, crowned at Milan with the iron crown, advanced upon Rome, expelled the papal legate, and was crowned emperor by two Lombard bishops. He now caused the pope to be deposed on a charge of heresy and breach of fealty. When Louis returned to Germany, Guelphic predominance at Rome was restored; but John died at Avignon in 1334, having accumulated 18,000,000 gold florins.

John XXIII., pope, a Neapolitan named Balthazar Cossa, was born at Naples about 1360. After completing his education at Bologna, he went to Rome, where he became chamberlain to Boniface IX., who in 1402 made him a cardinal. He promoted the election of Alexander V., when Gregory XII. was deposed. The plague driving Alexander from Rome, he was invited to Bologna by Cardinal Cossa. The pope fell ill and died in the house of his entertainer, who succeeded Alexander in 1410. By the decree of a council held at Constance in 1414, John was deposed and imprisoned for four years under charge of Lewis, duke of Bavaria. At the end of that time he was liberated, and found such favor with the existing pope, Martin V., that he was created by that pontiff cardinal-bishop of Tusculum, and dean of the sacred colleges, and allowed precedence over the other cardinals. He was author of an admired poem, De Varietate Fortunæ. He died at Florence, Italy, 1419.

Johnson, Andrew, seventeenth president of the United States, was born at Raleigh, N. C., 1808. He was self-educated, a tailor by trade, and made his entry into politics in 1840 as a presidential elector in Tennessee for Van Buren, the democratic candidate. In 1841 he was elected to the senate of Tennessee, and in 1843 became a member of congress, where for ten years he supported the policy of the democratic party. In 1853 he was elected governor of Tennessee, and again in 1855. In 1857 he was elected to the United States senate, in which he advocated the Union policy of the republican party; and on the occupation of Nashville by the federals, 1862, was appointed by President Lincoln military governor of Tennessee. In this position he gave such satisfaction to the North that in 1864 he was nominated by the republican party for the office of vice-president, and was elected with President Lincoln, then reëlected for his second term. On April 14, 1865, by the assassination of President Lincoln, he succeeded to the presidency. Some indiscreet and violent speeches, during a tour to Chicago and St. Louis, turned the tide against him, and in the congressional elections his opponents triumphed by increased majorities. His vetoes were generally nullified by the two-thirds vote of both houses. In 1867 Jackson suspended Stanton, secretary of war, who was reinstated by the senate the following year. An attempt to gain possession of the war department during this quarrel led to the impeachment of the president in 1868, but he was acquitted by a single vote. Chief-justice Salmon P. Chase, one of the most eminent American statesmen and jurists, presided at this remarkable trial. His term of office expired in 1869; and afterward he was elected United States senator, taking his seat in 1875. Died, 1875.

Johnson, Clifton, author, illustrator, was born at Hadley, Mass., 1865. He was educated in the common schools there, 1870-80, and ten years later entered upon a literary career. Author: The New England Country; The Country School; The Farmer's Boy; What They Say in New England; Country Clouds and Sunshine; Among English Hedgerows; Along French Byways; The Isle of the Shamrock; New England and Its Neighbors; The Land of Heather; Old-Time Schools and School-Books; Highways and Byways of the South; Highways and Byways of the Mississippi Valley. Editor of school editions of Jacob

Abbott's A Boy on a Farm; Maria Edgeworth's Waste Not Want Not Stories. Illustrator: White's Natural History of Selbourne; Barrie's Window in Thrums; Burroughs's Year in the Fields; Warner's Being a Boy; Dickens's Child's History of England; Blackmore's Lorna Doone; Jefferies' An English Village.

Johnson, Eastman, American artist, was born in Lovell, Me., 1824. He studied two years in royal academy, Düsseldorf. Among many notable genre pictures are: "The Old Kentucky Home"; "Husking Bee"; "The Old Stage Coach"; "Pension Agent"; "Prisoner of State." Among his sitters were many prominent men and women. He is represented in the Metropolitan museum of art and Lenox galleries, New York; Corcoran gallery, White House and treasury building, Washington; capitol at Albany; Knickerbocker, Century, and Union League clubs, chamber of commerce, etc., New York. Died, 1906.

Johnson, Hiram W., governor of California, 1911–15, was born in Sacramento, California, 1867; studied law. In 1906 was associated with Francis Heney in the San Francisco graft prosecutions. When Heney was shot down in open court, Johnson took his place and sent Abe Ruef, leader of the grafters, to the penitentiary for fourteen years. Elected governor of California on a platform designed to free the state of the domination of the Southern Pacific railroad and similar influences. Procured passage of twenty-three progressive amendments to state constitution. In 1912 nominated vice-president on the progressive ticket. Signed Anti-alien land bill in 1913.

Johnson, John A., American politician, late governor of Minnesota, was born in St. Peter, Minn., 1861. He was educated in the public schools, St. Peter; LL. D., university of Pennsylvania, 1907. He went to work at an early age in a printing office in St. Peter, continued in that business, and became a member of the firm of Essler and Johnson, publishers of the St. Peter Herald, of which he was editor. He served seven years in Minnesota national guard, becoming captain. Was state senator from St. Peter district; governor of Minnesota, 1904–09, and was a prominent candidate for the democratic presidential nomination, 1908. Died, 1909.

Johnson, Joseph French, American educator and economist, was born at Hardwick, Mass., 1853. He was graduated at Harvard, 1878; studied political economy and history in Germany for one year, and entered journalism, 1881. He was engaged on the Springfield Republican, later as financial editor of the Chicago Tribune, and established at Spokane, Wash., the Spokesman, 1890, which he sold in 1893. He was professor in Wharton school of commerce, university of Pennsylvania, 1893–1901; lecturer on finance, Columbian university, Washington, D. C., 1899–1903; has been professor of political economy, New York university, since 1901, and dean of the school of commerce, accounts and finance, since 1903. Author: Money and Currency; Syllabus of Money and Banking; and articles on financial and economic topics in leading reviews. He is also editor of the Journal of Accountancy.

Johnson, Reverdy, American lawyer and politician, was born in Annapolis, Md., 1796. He was educated at St. John's college, Annapolis, Md., studied law with his father, and was admitted to the bar in 1815. He began to practice in Upper Marlboro, and in 1817 removed to Baltimore. From 1821 until 1825 he was a state senator. From 1845 to 1849 he sat in the United States senate as a whig, but he supported the Mexican war beyond the lines of the political party to which he belonged. Later he was appointed attorney-general in President Taylor's cabinet. He opposed the doctrines of the American or know-nothing party, in 1856 united with the democrats, and supported the administration of James Buchanan. He again entered the United States senate in 1863, sustained the government throughout the civil war, and, when peace was restored, argued in favor of the prompt readmission of the southern states. Minister to Great Britain, 1868–69. Died, 1876.

Johnson, Dr. Samuel, English writer and lexicographer, was born at Lichfield, 1709, where his father was a bookseller. He was educated partly at Lichfield and partly at Stourbridge, and entered Pembroke college, Oxford, 1728. Here he remained for three years, and was compelled to leave the university without a degree. In 1731 his father died, greatly involved in debt; and, to procure a living, Johnson became usher in a school in Market Bosworth, Leicestershire. Disgusted with the ill-treatment he received there, he left, and was next employed in Birmingham in translating for a bookseller. Here in 1735 he married the widow of Mr. Porter, a mercer. His wife was twenty years his senior, but this disparity she compensated for by bringing her husband 800 pounds. Relying upon this capital, he opened a classical boarding school, but procured only three pupils, one of whom was the celebrated Garrick. Disappointed in this enterprise, he started in company with Garrick for London. They reached the metropolis in 1737, where Johnson was employed by Cave, the founder and proprietor of the Gentleman's Magazine. In 1738 his poem London, an imitation of the third satire of Juvenal, was published, and attracted some notice. From 1740 to 1743 he wrote the parliamentary debates for the Gentleman's Magazine, and in 1747 issued the prospectus of his English Dictionary, for which he was to receive 1,575 pounds. In 1750 he commenced his amusing periodical, The Rambler, and in 1755 his great Dictionary appeared. For this work the university of Oxford awarded him the degree of M. A. On the death of his mother in 1759, Johnson wrote the admirable story of Rasselas to pay her funeral expenses. In 1762 a pension of 300 pounds per annum was granted to him by the king, and subsequently he received the title of doctor of laws from both the universities of Dublin and Oxford. In 1781 he published his Lives of the Poets, and, after a life spent in incessant literary labor, died at his house in Bolt-court, Fleet street, London, 1784

Johnson, Tom Loftin, American politician and reformer, was born at Georgetown, Ky., 1854. He went to Indiana in boyhood, and was educated there; became clerk in street railway office, Louisville, Ky., 1869–75. He invented several street railway devices; bought a street railway in Indianapolis; later acquired large street railway interests in Cleveland, Detroit, and Brooklyn. He also engaged in the business of iron manufacturing in Cleveland. Was member of congress, 1891–95, prominent advocate of the "single-tax" theories of Henry George. He was mayor of Cleveland, 1901–10, and during his tenure of office gained national prominence by his campaign for a three-cent fare on the Cleveland street railway system, which, however, failed in 1909. Died, 1911.

Johnston, Albert Sydney, American general, was born in Kentucky, 1803, and was graduated at West Point, 1826. In 1837 he superseded General Houston as commander-in-chief of the Texan army; next became Texan war secretary, and served as a colonel of American regulars during the Mexican war. In 1857 he commanded the expedition sent against the Mormons of Utah; and in 1861 was made military commander of the department of Kentucky and Tennessee by the confederate government. After the surrender of Fort Donelson he formed a junction with the army of General Beauregard, and fell in the battle of Shiloh, 1862.

Johnston, Alexander, Scottish painter, was born at Edinburgh, 1815, and first exhibited at the royal academy in 1836. His earlier pieces were derived from Scottish song and story, and include: "The Gentle Shepherd"; "Sunday Morning"; "The Covenanter's Marriage"; "The Covenanter's Burial." Then followed: "The Arrest of John Brown the Lollard"; "The Pressgang"; "John Bunyan in Bedford Jail"; "The Cotter's Saturday Night"; "Robin Adair"; "The Child Queen, and Her Four Maries"; "The Flight of Mary Modena"; "Charlotte Corday"; "Flora Macdonald"; "The Elopement of Dorothy Vernon," etc. He died at Hampstead, 1891.

Johnston, Alexander, American historian, was born at Brooklyn, N. Y., 1849. He was graduated at Rutgers college, 1870; was admitted to the bar, 1876; and was professor of political economy and jurisprudence at Princeton from 1883 until his death in 1889. He wrote: History of American Politics; The Genesis of a New England State; History of the United States; The United States: its History and Constitution, etc.

Johnston, Sir Harry Hamilton, English traveler and writer, was born at Kennington, London, 1858. He was graduated at King's college, London; was a student at the royal academy of arts, 1876–80. Medalist South Kensington school of art, 1876; silver medalist zoölogical society, 1896; D. Sc., Cambridge. He traveled in North Africa, 1879–80; explored Portuguese West Africa and River Congo, 1882–83; commanded a scientific expedition of the royal society to Mount Kilimanjaro, 1884; was vice-consul in Cameroons, 1885; acting consul in Niger coast protectorate, 1887; consul for province of Mozambique, 1888; made an expedition to Lakes Nyasa and Tanganyika, which led to the founding of the British Central Africa protectorate, 1889; commissioner and consul-general, 1891; consul-general of regency of Tunis, 1897–99; special commissioner, commander-in-chief and consul-general for Uganda protectorate, etc., 1899–1901. Author: Essays on the Tunisian Question; River Congo; Kilimanjaro; History of a Slave; Life of Livingstone; British Central Africa; A History of the Colonization of Africa by Alien Races; The Uganda Protectorate; British Mammals; The Nile Quest; Liberia; George Grenfell and the Congo, etc.

Johnston, Joseph Eggleston, American soldier, was born in Virginia, 1807. He was graduated at West Point, 1829; served in the Mexican war, 1846–47; and was commissioned quartermaster-general of the United States army, 1860. He joined the confederate army as a brigadier-general at the outbreak of the civil war, served with distinction throughout that conflict, and in 1865 was in command of the army of the Tennessee. He published a volume of memoirs, chiefly military, in 1874. Died, 1891.

Johnston, Joseph Forney, lawyer, United States senator, was born in North Carolina, 1843. He left school to join the confederate army as a private in 1861; served during the war, was wounded four times, and rose to the rank of captain. After the war he was admitted to the bar; practiced law seventeen years; was a banker ten years; and was elected governor of Alabama in 1896, reëlected in 1898, serving four years. He was unanimously elected to the United States senate from Alabama to fill out the unexpired portion of the term of Hon. E. W. Pettus, deceased, ending 1909, also for the term 1909–15.

Johnston, Mary, American novelist, was born at Buchanan, Botetourt county, Va., 1870, daughter of John William Johnston. She was educated at home, and exhibited literary talent at an early age. Author: Prisoners of Hope; To Have and To Hold; Audrey; Sir Mortimer; The Goddess of Reason, Lewis Rand, The Long Roll.

Joinville (zhwăN'-vēl'), Jean, Sire de, French historical writer, was born in 1224, and became seneschal to the count of Champagne and king of Navarre. He took part in the unfortunate crusade of Louis IX., 1248–54, returned with him to France, and lived thereafter partly at court and partly on his estates. At Acre in 1250 he composed a Christian manual, his Credo; and throughout the crusade he took notes of events and wrote down his impressions. When almost eighty he undertook his delightful Vie de Saint Louis. His style conforms closely to his character; it is veracious, flowing, naïve, often singularly expressive. Died, 1317.

Jókai (yō'-kŏ-ē), Maurice, Hungarian novelist, was born at Komorn, Hungary, 1825. He published his first book in 1845, and took part as a journalist in the revolution of 1848. In 1863 he entered the Hungarian parliament, and during his long career there was one of the principal supporters of Koloman Tisza, 1875–90. He wrote about 200 novels, including Timar's Two Worlds; Black Diamonds; The Romance of the Coming Century; The New Landlord; Pretty Michal; The Lion of Janina; A Christian, but a Roman; The Baron's Sons; Tales from Jokai, etc. Died, 1904.

Joliet (Fr., zhō'-lyā'; Eng., jō'-lĭ-ĕt), Louis, French-Canadian explorer, one of the early explorers of the Mississippi, was born at Quebec, 1645. He studied for the priesthood at the Jesuit college, Quebec. He abandoned this intention, however, and spent some years as an Indian trader, thus getting a knowledge of the languages and the geography of the West. With Marquette he was selected to explore the western country and to push through to the Mississippi. They started West in May, 1673, reaching the Mississippi at the mouth of the Wisconsin in June. They floated down the Mississippi, passing the mouths of the Missouri and the Ohio, and going far enough to be sure that the river flowed into the gulf of Mexico. Joliet upset his canoe on his way back, losing all his maps and papers, so that the only accurate report of the expedition was Marquette's. Joliet was given the seigniory of Anticosti island in 1680, and later that of Joliette. Few men have contributed more to the geography of that time than did Joliet. Died, 1700.

Joly de Lotbinière, Sir Henry Gustave, Canadian statesman, was born in 1829. He was educated at the Sorbonne, Paris, France, and admitted to the bar of Quebec, 1855; queen's counsel, 1878. He was a member for Lotbinière of the Canadian assembly, 1861; returned in first election of house of commons, 1867–74; leader of opposition, 1874–78; declined seat in senate, 1874 and in 1877; premier of Quebec, 1878–79; leader of opposition, 1883–85; vice-chairman, Dominion liberal convention, 1883; minister of inland revenue for Dominion of Canada, 1896–1900; and lieutenant-governor of British Columbia, 1900–06. He always took an active interest in forestry, and was vice-president of the American forestry congress, 1885. He published various writings on forestry and on the metric system. Died, 1908.

Jomini (zhō'-mē'-nē'), Henri, Baron, noted Swiss soldier and military writer, was born at Payerne, Switzerland, 1779. When very young he entered the Swiss guard of Louis XVI., but when it was disbanded returned to his own country, and before he was twenty years old was made head of the war department. In 1803 he went to Paris and became aide-de-camp to Ney, who recommended him to the emperor. In 1809 he quarreled with Ney in Spain and went back to Switzerland; but in 1812 he was invited by Napoleon to join the campaign against Russia, and was appointed historian of the grand army. When the cause of Napoleon was almost lost he resented an affront he had received by going over to the allies. Napoleon bore him no ill-will for this course, saying, "He was not a Frenchman, and there was no love of country to retain him." The emperor of Russia made him his aid and lieutenant-general, and he served in the war against Turkey. He is known now chiefly by his works on military history and the art of war. He died at Passy, near Paris, 1869.

Jones, Henry Arthur, English dramatic author, was born at Grandborough, England, 1851. He was educated at Winslow, Bucks; hon. M. A. from Harvard university, 1907. Author: A Clerical Error; Silver King; Saints and Sinners; Middleman; Judah; The Dancing Girl; Crusaders; The Bauble Shop; The Tempter; The Masqueraders; The Case of Rebellious Susan; The Triumph of the Philistines; Michael and his Lost Angel; The Rogue's Comedy; The Physician; The Liars; The Manœuvres of Jane; Carnac Sahib; The Lackey's Carnival; Mrs. Dane's Defence; The Princess's Nose; The Idol; Whitewashing Julia; Joseph Entangled; The Chevaleer; The Heroic Stubbs; The Hypocrites; The Evangelist; The Renascence of the English Drama; essays, lectures, etc.

Jones, Inigo, English architect, was born in London about 1573. In his youth his talent for drawing attracted the notice of the earls of Arundel and Pembroke; the latter enabled him to visit Italy to study landscape painting. At Venice his attention was drawn to the works of Palladio, which awoke in him a passion for architecture, to which his attention was thenceforward wholly directed. Having been appointed first architect to Christian IV. of Denmark, when that monarch visited James I. in England, Jones attended him, remained there, and became architect to the queen. In 1620 he was named one of the commissioners for repairing St. Paul's cathedral, and in 1622 completed the banqueting-house at Whitehall. He realized considerable wealth, but during the civil war was exposed to some persecution on account of his being a Roman Catholic. He wrote a book on Stonehenge. Died, 1652.

Jones, Jenkin Lloyd, independent minister, editor, and lecturer, was born at Cardiganshire, South Wales, 1843. His parents moved to Wisconsin when he was an infant. He served as a private in the 6th Wisconsin battery for three years in the civil war; was graduated from Meadville, Pa., theological seminary, 1870; was nine years pastor of All Souls church, Janesville, Wis.; secretary of western Unitarian conference for nine years; organized and was first secretary of western Unitarian Sunday school society; in 1878, with others, established Unity, a weekly paper, now organ of the congress of religion, and has been its editor since 1879; organized and since 1882 has been pastor of All Souls church, Chicago. Author: The Faith that Makes Faithful, with William C. Gannett; Practical Piety; Word of the Spirit; Jess: Bits of Wayside Gospel; A Search for An Infidel; Bits of Wayside Gospel, second series; Nuggets from a Welsh Mine; Reinforcement of Faith; Conscience Calls; Love and Loyalty, sermons, etc.

Jones, John Paul, American naval commander, was born at Arbigland, in Scotland, 1747. His original name was John Paul. He became a sailor, was for a short time engaged in the slave-trade, and afterward settled in Virginia, assuming the name of Jones. He ardently embraced the cause of the American colonies. When the congress, in 1775, resolved to fit out a naval force, he offered his services; and, visiting the British coast in a brig of eighteen guns, performed some remarkably bold exploits, and took advantage of his familiarity with the scenes of his boyhood to make a hostile visit to the shores of the Solway Firth. In 1779 he was appointed to the command of a small squadron of French ships displaying the American flag, with which he again visited the British coasts, causing great alarm and taking some prizes. Off Flamborough he fell in with a fleet of forty-one British merchantmen, convoyed by the forty-gun Serapis and the twenty-gun Countess of Scarborough. Jones lashed his Bon Homme Richard to the Serapis and after three hours of desperate fighting compelled her surrender, after which, his own ship sinking, he transferred his crew to the Serapis. The king of France made him a chevalier of the order of military merit. After the war Jones attempted, along with John Ledyard, to establish a fur-trade between the northwestern coast of America and China, but failed. In 1787 he accepted an appointment in the Russian service, and the command of a fleet at the mouth of the Dneiper, with which he took an active part in the Turkish war, but soon left the service. He died at Paris, 1792.

Jones, Samuel Milton, American political reformer, known as "Golden Rule" Jones because of his persistent advocacy of that practice in politics and in business, was born in Wales, 1846. Brought to America in 1849, he worked as a boy in the oil fields. He established large manufacturing plants at Toledo, Ohio, and gained an immense fortune and a splendid reputation in business. Elected as a republican mayor of Toledo in 1897, he was reëlected on an independent ticket in 1899, 1901, and 1903; used his office to defeat graft and dishonesty and to secure the rights of the common citizen. Died, 1904.

Jones, Wesley L., lawyer, United States senator, was born near Bethany, Ill., 1863. He was graduated at Southern Illinois college, 1886; read law in Chicago, and moved to the territory of Washington just before its admission as a state, 1889. He first worked in a real estate office; began law practice, 1890. He took part as speaker in Blaine campaign, 1884, and Harrison campaign, 1888, in Illinois, and since that in every campaign in Washington. He was member of congress from the state-at-large, 1899–1909, and was elected to the United States senate for the term 1909–15.

Jones, Sir William, English orientalist, was born in London, 1746. He was educated at Harrow and at University college, Oxford, where his remarkable attainments attracted attention. In 1765 he became tutor to the son of Earl Spencer; in 1774 was called to the bar, and in 1776 became commissioner of bankrupts, publishing meanwhile a Persian Grammar, 1772, Latin Commentaries on Asiatic Poetry, 1774, and a translation of seven ancient Arabic poems, 1780. In 1783 he obtained a judgeship in the supreme court of judicature in Bengal, and was knighted. He at once devoted himself to Sanskrit, whose startling resemblance to Latin and Greek he was the first to point out in 1787. He established the Asiatic society of Bengal in 1784, and was its first president. He had finished his translation of Sakuntala, the Hitopadesa, parts of the Vedas, and Manu, when he died at Calcutta, 1794. There is a monument to his memory, erected by the East India company, in St. Paul's cathedral.

Jonson, Benjamin, or Ben, English dramatist, was born at Westminster, about 1573, and was educated at Westminster school. The first piece that brought him into prominence was Every Man in His Humor, published in 1598. The best of his subsequent productions are Volpone, or the Fox, The Silent Woman, and The Alchemist. He also composed two tragedies, Sejanus and Catiline's Conspiracy, on which he — but only he — set a high value. His Masques, written for the courts of James and Charles, are very graceful. Jonson had a pension from these monarchs, but his improvidence involved him in difficulties, and he died in poverty, 1637.

Jordaens (yôr'-dăns), Jakob, Flemish painter, was born at Antwerp, 1593. He ranks next to Rubens among Flemish painters, and was master in the guild of St. Luke. He excelled in humorous scenes of Flemish life, also painted scriptural and mythological subjects. Among his works are: "Jesus in the Midst of the Doctors"; "The Adoration of the Shepherds"; "The Satyr and the Man who Blew Hot and Cold," etc. Died, 1678.

Jordan, David Starr, American naturalist and educator, president, 1891–1913, chancellor since 1913, Leland Stanford Jr. university, Cal.; was born at Gainesville, N. Y., 1851. He was graduated at Cornell university, M. S., 1872; M. D., Indiana medical college, 1875; Ph. D., Butler university, 1878; LL. D., Cornell, 1886. Johns Hopkins, 1902. He was professor in various collegiate institutions, 1872–79; assistant to United States fish commission, 1877–91 and 1894–1909; professor of zoölogy, 1879–85, and president, 1885–91, Indiana university. Chief director, World peace foundation, since 1910. He is also United States commissioner in charge of fur seal investigations, etc. Author: A Manual of Vertebrate Animals of Northern United States; Science Sketches; Fishes of North and Middle America; Footnotes to Evolution; The Story of Matka; Care and Culture of Men; The Innumerable Company; Imperial Democracy; Animal Life; Animal Forms, with V. L. Kellogg and H. Heath; The Strength of Being Clean; Standeth God Within the Shadow; To Barbara, verse; The Philosophy of Hope; The Blood of the Nation; Food and Game Fishes of North America, with B. W. Evermann; A Guide to the Study of Fishes; Voice of the Scholar; The Call of the Twentieth Century; also numerous papers on ichthyology in proceedings of various societies and government bureaus.

Joseph, favorite son of Jacob by his wife Rachel, who excited the envy of his elder brothers and was by them sold into Egyptian slavery, was born in Haran and died in Egypt. He flourished about the nineteenth century B. C. Having acquired the confidence of Pharaoh through his successful interpretation of dreams, he was placed as viceroy at the head of the arrangements for provisioning the kingdom during seven consecutive years of famine, and was thus enabled to preserve, in the persons of his father and brothers, with their families, the future Israelitish nation. His body was embalmed and carried up into Canaan by the Israelites at their exodus.

Joseph I., emperor of Germany, was born at Vienna, 1678, and was crowned king of Hungary in 1687. He then succeeded his father, Leopold I., as emperor of Germany in 1705. He granted privileges to the Protestants, and, in alliance with Britain, prosecuted successfully the war of the Spanish succession against France, under command of Prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough. He died in 1711.

Joseph II., emperor of Germany, son of Francis I. and Maria Theresa, was born in 1741. In 1764 he was elected king of the Romans, and after his father's death, in 1765, emperor of Germany; but until his mother's death his power was limited to the command of the army and the direction of foreign affairs. Although he failed to add Bavaria to the Austrian dominions, he acquired Galicia, Lodomeria, and Zips, at the first partition of Poland in 1772; and in 1780 he appropriated a great part of Passau and Salzburg. As soon as he found himself in full possession of the government of Austria he declared himself independent of the pope, and prohibited the publication of any new papal bulls without his placet. He suppressed 700 convents, reduced the number of the regular clergy from 63,000 to 27,000, prohibited papal dispensations as to marriage, and in 1781 published the edict of toleration for Protestants and Greeks. He also abolished serfdom, reorganized taxation, and curtailed the feudal privileges of the nobles. In 1788 he engaged in an unsuccessful war with Turkey; and the vexation caused by this, and by revolts in his dominions, hastened his death, 1790.

Josephine, Marie Josèphe Rose Tascher de la Pagerie, first empress of the French, was born in Martinique, 1763. She married first the Vicomte de Beauharnais, by whom she became mother of Eugène Beauharnais, and Hortense, mother of Napoleon III. Her husband perished during the reign of terror, and she married, in 1796, Napoleon Bonaparte, the newly-appointed commander-in-chief of the army of Italy. Sharing her husband's fortunes, she became in time the occupant of an imperial throne, which she adorned by her beauty, grace, and womanly virtues. Failing, however, to afford an heir to the new monarchy, Napoleon, despite the promptings of his better nature, resolved to divorce her, which act was consummated in 1809. Josephine thereupon retired into privacy at her château of Malmaison. Died, 1814.

Josephus (jō-sē'-fus), Flavius, celebrated Jewish historian, was born at Jerusalem, 37 A. D. He was of priestly descent, and took part in the revolt of the Jews against the Romans, 66–73 A. D., and served as one of the Jewish generals. He was taken prisoner by Vespasian, by whom, however, and by Vespasian's successors, Titus and Domitian, he was treated with great favor. As a dependent of the Flavian family, he assumed his name of Flavius. His Antiquities of the Jews, in twenty books, gives an account of Jewish history from the creation of the world to 66 A. D. A remarkable passage in this work relating to Jesus Christ is now believed to be spurious. His other works are: History of the Jewish War, and an Autobiography. He died about 100 A. D.

Joshua (jŏsh'-ū-a), celebrated Hebrew warrior under whose leadership the land of Canaan was conquered, was the son of Nun, of the tribe of Ephraim, and was born in Egypt. The so-called book of Joshua, in its present form, containing an account of the conquest and division of the "land of promise," is of composite structure. The compiler made copious use, especially in the earlier chapters, of documents drawn up during the period of the conquest. He died about 1425 B. C.

Josiah (jō-sī̆'-a), king of Judah, succeeded his father Amon at eight years of age, and flourished about 641–609 B. C. He reëstablished the worship of Jehovah, and instituted the rites in the newly-discovered "book of the law." He fell at Megiddo attempting to check Pharaoh-Necho's advance against the Assyrians.

Joubert (you'-bĕrt), Petrus Jacobus, Boer general and statesman, was born in Cape Colony, 1831. He was a farmer and ranchman; became a member of the Volksraad; was attorney-general in 1870; and in 1874 was acting-president. He was one of the triumvirate who organized a Transvaal revolt against the British government in 1880, held the chief command in the engagements at Laing's Nek, Ingogo river, and Majuba hill. In 1899 he was commander-in-chief of the Boer forces in the war with England. He conducted the siege of Ladysmith, but was forced to retire on account of ill-health. Died, 1900.

Joule (joul), James Prescott, English physicist, was born at Salford, England, 1818. He was a pupil of Dalton's, and devoted his time to physical and chemical research; made discoveries in connection with the production of heat by voltaic electricity, demonstrated the equivalence of heat and energy, and established on experimental grounds the doctrine of the conservation of energy. Died, 1889.

Jourdan (zho͞or′-däɴ′), Jean Baptiste, Comte, French marshal, was born at Limoges, France, 1762. He served in the wars of the republic, 1792–96, and in 1799 was appointed commander of the army of the Danube by the directory. In 1797 he became president of the council of five hundred, but was expelled in 1799, owing to his opposition to Bonaparte, by whom, however, he was afterward employed. He subsequently followed the fortunes of Joseph Bonaparte in Naples and Spain. He owed his title to Louis XVIII. Died, 1833.

Jowett (jou′-ĕt), Benjamin, English classical scholar, master of Balliol college, Oxford, was born at Camberwell, 1817. He was a fellow and tutor of his college until his election to the mastership in 1870. In 1882 he was appointed vice-chancellor of the university. His name will always be associated with Balliol college, where his influence was felt, and made the deepest impression. He wrote On the Interpretation of Scripture, a commentary on certain epistles of St. Paul; but he achieved his greatest literary successes by his translation of Plato's Dialogues, the History of Thucydides, and the Politics of Aristotle. Died, 1893.

Jowett, Rev. J. H., clergyman, was born in England, 1864; educated at Edinburgh and Oxford. He was first called to be minister of St. James's Congregational church, Newcastle-on-Tyne, remaining there six years. From 1895 to 1911 he was minister of Carr's Lane Congregational church, Birmingham, and in 1910 president of the free church council. Since 1911 he has been pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian church of New York City. Author: Apostolic Optimism; From Strength to Strength; Meditations for Quiet Moments; Brooks by the Traveller's Way; Thirsting for the Springs; The Passion for Souls; Silver Lining.

Joy, George William, British artist, was born at Dublin, Ireland, 1844. He was educated at Harrow, and studied at Kensington, the royal academy, and at Paris under Charles Jalabert and Bonnat. Pictures: "Domenica"; "Chess-players"; "Laodamia"; "Young Nelson's First Farewell"; "Wellington at Angers"; "The Death of General Gordon"; "Reverie," for New Zealand government; "Joan of Arc"; "Lear and Cordelia"; "The Drummer of the Peninsular"; "Christ and a Little Child"; "A Merchantman Seeking Goodly Pearls"; "A Dinner of Herbs"; "The King's Daughter"; "Dreams on the Veldt"; "Griselda"; "A Dream of Fair Women"; and many portraits. He obtained gold medals at Paris, Munich, and Berlin, and also the Chicago medal.

Juárez (hwä′-rās), Benito, Mexican politician, was born in Oaxaca, 1806, of Indian parents. He became an advocate, and was governor of his native state in 1847–52. Exiled by Santa Anna in 1853, he returned two years later, and in 1857 was elected president of the supreme court. In 1858 he assumed the executive, but was compelled to retire to Vera Cruz, whence he issued decrees abolishing religious orders and confiscating church property. In 1861 he entered the capital, and was elected president for four years. In 1862 the French emperor declared war against Juárez, who retreated to the northern frontier; but, on the withdrawal of the French, he reëntered Mexico city in 1867, the emperor, Maximilian, having meanwhile been shot by court-martial. Juárez was elected president again in 1871. He died in 1872.

Juch (yo͞oᴋ), Emma Johanna Antonia (Mrs. Francis L. Wellman), operatic singer, was born during the sojourn of her parents in Vienna, Austria-Hungary, 1863, daughter of Justin Juch. They returned to the United States when she was two years old, making their home in New York. She was graduated at the normal school, 1879, and married, in 1894, Francis L. Wellman, New York. She studied three years with Murio-Celli; made her début in concert at Chickering hall, N. Y., and her operatic début in her majesty's grand Italian opera, London, 1881, as Felina in Mignon. Later she sang during three seasons under Colonel Mapleson in soprana rôles, alternating with Nilsson as Elsa in Lohengrin under management of Theodore Thomas. Was prima donna with the American opera company three seasons, and since then has sung in festivals, orchestral symphonic concerts, and in the Emma Juch grand English opera company.

Judson, Adoniram, American missionary, was born in Malden, Mass., 1788. He first contemplated becoming a playwright, but in 1812, having married, sailed for India. Settling in Rangoon as a Baptist missionary, he began to preach and write in Burmese, translating portions of the new testament. During the Burmese war he was imprisoned at Ava; and he subsequently labored in various towns of British Burmah and among the Karens with remarkable success. In 1833 his translation of the Bible was completed, and there followed a Burmese-English dictionary. He died at sea, 1850.

Judson, Harry Pratt, American educator, president of the university of Chicago since 1907, was born in Jamestown, N. Y., 1849. He was graduated at Williams college, 1870, LL. D., 1893; LL. D., 1903, Queens university, Canada. He was teacher and principal of high school, Troy, N. Y., 1870–85; professor of history, university of Minnesota, 1885–92; and head professor of political science and dean of the faculties of arts, literature and science, Chicago university, 1892–1907. Author: History of the Troy Citizens' Corps; Cæsar's Army; Cæsar's Commentaries (co-editor); Europe in the Nineteenth Century; The Growth of the American Nation; The Higher Education as a Training for Business; The Latin in English; The Mississippi Valley, in Shaler's United States of America; The Young American; The Government of Illinois; Graded Literature Readers, co-editor; The Essentials of a Written Constitution, etc.

Julian (jo͞ol′-yan; jo͞o′-li-an), or Julianus, Flavius Claudius, surnamed the Apostate, Roman emperor, 361–63, was born in Constantinople, probably 331 A. D. He was the youngest son of Constantine the Great, and was educated in the tenets of Christianity, but apostatized to paganism. In 355 he was declared Cæsar, and sent to Gaul, where he obtained several victories over the Germans; and in 361 the troops in Gaul revolted from Constantius and declared for Julian. He took from the Christian churches their riches, and divided them among his soldiers. He sought likewise to induce the Christians, by flattery or by favor, to embrace paganism. His malice was further evinced by extraordinary indulgence to the Jews, and an attempt to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem, that the prophecy of Christ might be falsified; but the design was frustrated. He did not long survive his disappointment, being killed in 363 in his expedition against the Persians.

Julien (zhü'-lyăN'), Stanislas Aignan, Chinese scholar, was born at Orleans, France, 1799. He became at twenty-one assistant professor at the Collège de France. He gave himself with such zeal to the study of Chinese that in less than a year he was able to make a Latin translation of Mencius. He succeeded Abel Rémusat as professor of Chinese at the Collège de France, 1832, and became head of the Collège Impériale, 1854. He was also keeper of the Bibliothèque Impériale. Julien produced admirable French versions of specimens of the Chinese drama and of Chinese romances, as well as a collection of Indian novels. Among his translations were the great manuals of Chinese religion and philosophy containing the doctrines of Laotse and others; and the life and journeys of Hiouen-Tsang. His Syntaxe Nouvelle de la Langue Chinoise appeared 1869–70. Died, 1873.

Julius II., Pope (Cardinal Giuliano della Rovere), was born in Italy, 1443, became pope in 1503. He endeavored to extend the papal territory, and, after driving Cesare Borgia from the Romagna, formed the league of Cambrai with Maximilian and Louis XII. against Venice in 1508. After the submission of the republic, he turned his arms against France in 1510. In 1511 the holy league was formed, and the French army driven back over the Alps. He sanctioned the marriage of Henry VIII. with Catharine of Aragon, commenced to rebuild St. Peter's at Rome, and was the patron of Michaelangelo and Raphael. Died, 1513.

Junker (yŏŏng'-kẽr), Wilhelm, African traveler, was born of German parents in Moscow, 1840. He studied medicine in Germany, and in 1876–78 traveled among the western tributaries of the upper Nile. In 1879 he explored the Welle-Makua, afterward proved to be identical with the Ubangi, an affluent of the Congo. After four years among the Mangbuttu and Niam-Niam, and some time with Emin Pasha, he reached Cairo in 1887. He died at St. Petersburg, 1892. Published Reisen in Afrika, etc.

Junot (zhü'-nō'), Andoche, marshal of France, was born at Bussy-le-Grand, 1771, and distinguished himself in the early wars of the republic. Napoleon took him to Egypt as adjutant. Later he was made governor of Paris, and in 1807 was appointed to the command of the army of Portugal. He quickly made himself master of all the strong places in the kingdom, was created Duc d'Abrantès, and appointed governor of Portugal; but, defeated by Wellington at Vimeiro, was obliged to conclude the treaty of Cintra and retire from Portugal. He served in Germany and Russia, and, made one of the scapegoats for the Russian disaster, was sent to govern Illyria. Becoming deranged, he was taken to his father's house near Dijon, threw himself from a window, 1813, and died seven days afterward.

Jusserand (zhü'-s'-räN'), Jean Adrien Antoine Jules, French diplomat and man of letters, French ambassador at Washington since 1902, was born at Lyons, 1855. He was educated at Lyons and Paris, and entered the foreign office in 1876. LL. D., Chicago university, Columbia, university of Pennsylvania, McGill, and Harvard. He was councillor of the French embassy at London, 1887–90; member of the legion of honor, 1883, and minister at Copenhagen, 1898. Author: Les Anglais au moyen âge; La Vie Nomade et les Routes d'Angleterre au xiv. siècle; Le Roman au temps de Shakespeare; Histoire littéraire du Peuple anglais; Shakespeare en France; Les sports et jeux d'exercice dans l'ancienne France, etc.

Jussieu (zhü'-syû'), Antoine Laurent de, French botanist, was born at Lyons, France, 1748. At the age of seventeen he began his botanical studies under his uncle Bernard, and four years later was nominated demonstrator and assistant to Lemonnier, the professor of botany in the Jardin du Roi. He reformed the arrangement of the gardens and collections of plants under his charge, and applied to them his own and his uncle's ideas in regard to the natural method. For thirty years he continued to develop his novel views; and when his Genera Plantarum, which he began in 1778, was completed in 1789, the natural system was finally established as the true basis of botany. In 1793 he became professor of botany in the newly organized Jardin des Plantes, where he continued to teach until 1826, when blindness compelled him to resign his chair to his son Adrien. He founded the library of the museum, one of the best in Europe. His papers in the Annales du Muséum and his articles in the Dictionnaire des Sciences Naturelles rank among the most valuable contributions to the literature of botany, and embody all the results of his own investigations. Died in Paris, 1836.

Justin, surnamed the Martyr, was born at Shechem in Samaria about 100 A. D., and was successively a stoic and a Platonist; and after his conversion to Christianity wandered about, arguing for the truth of the new faith. At Rome between 150 and 160 he wrote the Apologia of Christianity addressed to the emperor, followed by a second one. He is said to have been martyred about 165 A. D.

Justinian (jŭs-tĭn'-ĭ-an) the Great (Flavius Anicius), nephew of the emperor Justin, was born 483 A. D., in the village of Tauresium. His reign, which extended from 527 over a period of thirty-eight years, was the most brilliant in the history of the eastern empire. He had the fortune or the skill to select the ablest generals of the last days of Roman military ascendancy. In his first war — that with Persia — he concluded a treaty by which the long impending crisis was at last warded off; but the rejoicings which celebrated its termination had almost proved fatal, by a domestic revolution, to the authority of Justinian himself. Belisarius, with a relentless hand, repressed the tumult, 30,000 victims having, it is said, fallen in a single day. He then reannexed the Vandal kingdom of Africa to the empire, and, conjointly with Narses, restored the imperial authority as well in Rome as in northern Italy and a large portion of Spain. Justinian constructed or renewed and strengthened the vast line of fortifications along the eastern and south-eastern frontier of his empire. These works of defense and the construction of many public buildings, both in his capital and in other cities of the empire, involved an enormous expenditure, and the fiscal administration of Justinian pressed heavily on the public resources; but it is admitted to have been ably and uprightly conducted. It is, however, as a legislator that Justinian has gained renown. Immediately on his accession he compiled a code which comprised all the constitutions and laws of his predecessors, now known as the Code of Justinian. The authoritative commentaries of the jurists were next harmonized and published under the title Digesta or Pandectæ. The code was republished in 534 with the addition of Justinian's own constitutions. His third great legal undertaking was the composition of a systematic treatise on the laws for the guidance of students and lawyers, published a short time before the Digest under the title of Institutiones. His personal virtues were of a high degree, and his public administration, with the single exception of that of ecclesiastical affairs, in which he was an arbitrary and imperious intermeddler, exhibits great ability and just and upright intentions. He died in 565.

Juvenal, or Juvenalis, Decimus Junius, celebrated Latin poet and satirist, was born in Aquinum, about 60 A. D. He was a friend of Martial and contemporary of Statius and Quintilian. His satires, sixteen in number, are written in indignant scorn of the vices of the Romans under the empire, in the descriptions of which the historian finds a portrait of the manners and morals of the time. He practiced at Rome as an advocate, and, it is thought, also visited Egypt. Died about 140 A. D.

Juxon (jŭk'-sun), William, English prelate, was born at Chichester, 1582. He was graduated at St. John's college, Oxford, succeeded Laud as its president in 1621, and became a prebendary of Chichester and dean of Worcester, 1628; bishop of London, 1633, and lord high treasurer, 1635. In Charles's vacillation about the fate of Strafford, Juxon advised him to refuse his assent to the bill. He ministered to the king in his last moments, and it was into his hands that Charles delivered his son George with the word "Remember." After the restoration Juxon was appointed archbishop of Canterbury. He died in 1663.

Kalakaua (kä'-lä-kou'-ä), David, king of the Hawaiians, 1874–91, was born in Honolulu, 1836, and was descended from Keawe, an ancient king of the islands. He received an English education with Prince Lunalilo and fifteen other hereditary chiefs in the royal school at Honolulu. In 1860 he visited California. On the death of Lunalilo, who appointed no successor, Kalakaua was elected king in 1874 by the legislature, over Emma, queen dowager and relict of Kamehameha IV. The partisans of Emma, on hearing the result, broke into the courthouse and attacked the legislature which had elected her rival. Assistance being asked from the English and American ships in port, the rioters were dispersed, and Kalakaua was crowned the seventh king of the Hawaiians. In 1887 he granted a new constitution restricting the royal prerogative. Died, 1891.

Kames (kāmz), Henry Home, Lord, Scottish philosopher and critic, was born at Kames in Berwickshire, 1696. He was admitted to the bar in 1723, and appointed to the bench as Lord Kames in 1752. Besides books on Scotch laws he published Essays on Morality; An Introduction to the Art of Thinking; Elements of Criticism, his best-known work; and Sketches of the History of Man. Died, 1782.

Kamimura, Hikonojo, Japanese admiral, was born in Satsuma, 1850. He commanded a cruiser in the Chino-Japanese war, 1894-95, was promoted vice-admiral, 1903, and at the outbreak of the Russo-Japanese war was placed in command of the second Japanese squadron. In 1904 he sank the Russian cruiser Rurik off Ulsan, Korea, and gained a decisive victory over the Russian squadron.

Kane, Elisha Kent, arctic explorer, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., 1820. He entered the United States navy as a surgeon, in which capacity he visited China, India, the East Indies, and, under leave of absence, Arabia, Egypt, Greece, and western Europe. In 1850 he commenced his career of arctic discovery as surgeon, naturalist, and historian to the first Grinnell expedition. In the spring of 1853 he was again sent out, this time as commander of a second Grinnell expedition, in which he achieved important results. Died, 1857.

Katsura (kä'-tsŏŏ-rä), Marquis Taro, Japanese statesman, four times premier of Japan, was born in the province of Choshu, 1847. During the restoration era, in 1867, he distinguished himself in the civil war; studied military science in Germany, and for some time was military attaché in Berlin. On his return home he was gazetted major-general, was appointed vice-minister of the war office, under General Oyama, and took a prominent part in the reform of the Japanese army. In 1891 he was promoted to lieutenant-general, and in the following year was appointed to the command of the third division of the army. During the Chino-Japanese war he marched with his division through Korea to Manchuria; and later on served under General Nodzu. For his services he was created a viscount, and two years after promoted to the rank of general. In 1898 he was appointed war minister, and held that post until the downfall of the Yamagata cabinet in 1900. He was premier of Japan from 1901 until 1906, covering the period of the war with Russia, and in 1906 was appointed a member of the high military council of Japan. Grand cross of the bath, 1905, marquis, 1907. He became premier again in 1908, 1909, and 1912. Resigned, 1913.

Kauffmann (kouf'-män), Angelica, Swiss historical and portrait painter, was born at Coire, Grisons, in the Tyrol, 1741. She began to paint portraits when a mere child. In 1765 Lady Wentworth persuaded her to go to London, where she became famous as a painter of portraits and of classical and mythological pictures. She was also an accomplished singer. In 1781 she married the Italian painter Zucchi, and, returning to Rome, spent remainder of her life in a circle of poets, artists, and scholars. Died, 1807.

Kaulbach (koul'-bäᴋ), Wilhelm von, German painter, was born at Arolsen, 1805. He studied at Düsseldorf, Munich, and Rome, and from 1849 was director of the Munich academy of painting. His realistic tendencies came out in his illustrations of Schiller, Goethe's Faust, and Reineke Fuchs, and in his Madhouse. In 1834 he completed his grandiose "Battle of the Huns"; in 1838 the "Destruction of Jerusalem by Titus." For several years he was painting the vestibule of the new museum at Berlin with a cycle illustrating the progress of civilization. His last gigantic painting was the "Sea-fight of Salamis" at Munich. Died, 1874.

Kaunitz (kou'-nĭts), Wenzel Anton, Prince von, Austrian statesman, was born at Vienna, 1711. He distinguished himself in 1748 at the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, and as Austrian ambassador at the French court in 1750–52 converted old enmity into friendship. In 1753 he was appointed chancellor, and for almost forty years had the principal direction of Austrian politics. He took an active part in the ecclesiastical reforms of Joseph II., and was a liberal patron of arts and sciences. Died, 1794.

Kean, Charles John, British actor, was born in Waterford, Ireland, 1811, son of Edmund Kean. He was educated at Eton, and made his début at Drury Lane, 1827, but did not establish his reputation until 1838, when he acted as Hamlet, Richard III., and Sir Giles Overreach. In 1842 he married Miss Ellen Tree, a celebrated actress. From 1850 to 1859 he was manager of the Princess's theater, London. His last appearance was as Louis XI. at Liverpool in 1867. Died, 1868.

Kean, Edmund, English actor, was born in London, 1787, son of Nance Carey, a strolling actress. A stage cupid and a cabin-boy to Madeira, he himself about sixteen turned a "stroller," and after ten years in the provinces made his first appearance at Drury Lane as Shylock in 1814. He at once took rank as the first actor of the day. A period of wonderful success followed; but by his irregularities he gradually forfeited public approval. He was cordially received in 1827 after a twelve-months' visit to America; but both mind and body gave way, and, breaking down hopelessly in 1833, he died at Richmond in May of that year. His greatest successes were as Shylock, Hamlet, Iago, Othello, and as Luke in Riches.

Kean, John, capitalist, ex-United States senator, was born at Ursino, near Elizabeth, N. J., 1852. He entered Yale college in the class of 1876, but left to study law; graduated at Columbia college law school, 1875; M. A., Yale, 1890. He was admitted to the New Jersey bar, 1877; was elected to the forty-eighth and fiftieth congresses; was member of the committee to revise the judiciary system of the state. He is president of the National state bank of Elizabeth, N. J., and vice-president of the Manhattan trust company, of New York. In 1899 he was elected to the United States senate to succeed James Smith, Jr., and was reëlected in 1905.

Keane, Augustus Henry, British ethnologist and geographer; was emeritus professor of Hindustani, University college, London; was born at Cork, Ireland, 1833. Keane, John Joseph, American scholar and educator, Roman Catholic archbishop of Dubuque, Ia., since 1900, was born in Ballyshannon, Ireland, 1839. He came to the United States in 1846; was educated at St. Charles's college and St. Mary's seminary, Baltimore, Md. Ordained priest, 1866; assistant pastor of St. Patrick's church, Washington, D. C., 1866–78; consecrated bishop of Richmond, Va., 1878. Was active in organizing Roman Catholic societies, and was rector of the Catholic university of America, at Washington, 1886–97, when he resigned and went to Rome. Upon his return to America he was installed as bishop of his present see. Author: Onward and Upward, etc.

Kearny (kär'-nĭ), General Philip, American soldier, was born in New York, 1815. He was attached to the staff of General Scott, 1841–44, and distinguished himself in the Mexican war. He then served as a volunteer in the French army in the war against Austria, and was present at the battle of Magenta and Solferino; commanded the cavalry of the army of the Potomac in the peninsular campaign during the civil war, in which he won an enviable reputation for courage and gallantry. He took an active part in the second battle of Bull Run and also at Chantilly, Va., where he was killed in 1862 by a confederate soldier while reconnoitering in front of his command.

Keats, John, English poet, was born in London, 1795. He was apprenticed to a surgeon at Edmonton, near London, and found time to cultivate that taste for poetry which he had exhibited from his boyhood; in 1817 he published a volume of juvenile poems, having already made several contributions to the London Examiner, then under the editorship of Leigh Hunt. In 1818 appeared his Endymion, a poetic romance founded in part on the model of Fletcher's Faithful Shepherdess. This work, though the production of a youth of little more than two-and-twenty, was severely criticised in the Quarterly Review, and in Blackwood's Magazine, the wrath of the reviewers being probably inspired by their hatred of the political party with which Keats had identified himself, and which was represented by Keat's friends, Hazlitt and Hunt. He profited, however, by the criticisms of his reviewers; and in 1820 published his Eve of St. Agnes; his odes to The Nightingale and The Grecian Urn; and the fragments of Hyperion, taken, like Endymion, from mythological sources, and written in an airy strain of classic imagery, characterized by much pensive quiet beauty. These works, and especially the Hyperion, were far superior both in conception and execution to anything which Keats had yet produced, and he was encouraged at this time by a more kindly review of his earlier poem, which appeared in the Edinburgh Review from the pen of Francis Jeffrey. But already consumption had taken hold of the poet; he went to Naples, from there to Rome, where he died, 1821.

Keble (kē'-b'l), John, English clergyman and poet, was born in 1792. His early education was directed by his father, and at the age of fifteen he entered Corpus Christi college, Oxford, where he won several prizes and otherwise distinguished himself. In 1827 he published his volume of sacred poetry entitled the Christian Year, which attained a very large circulation and an influence that can hardly be overestimated. He was one of the leading spirits in what was known as the "tractarian movement" in the English church, and for several years was actively engaged with Pusey, Newman, and others in issuing Tracts for the Times, which culminated with tract No. 90, which appeared in 1841. He died at Bournemouth, 1866.

She is descended on her father's side from Alexander Spottswood, colonial governor of Virginia, and through her mother related to Adams and Everett families of New England. She has been deaf and blind since the age of nineteen months as result of illness. At the age of seven she was placed under the instruction of Miss Anne Mansfield Sullivan, her teacher from the beginning of her education to the present time. She entered Radcliffe college, 1900, and graduated, A. B., 1904. She has contributed occasional papers to Century Magazine; Youth's Companion; Ladies' Home Journal; McClure's Magazine, etc., and is the author of The Story of My Life; Optimism, an essay; The World I Live In, etc.

Kellermann (kĕl'-ĕr-män), François Christophe, French soldier, was born in Bavaria, 1735, and entered a regiment of French hussars at the early age of seventeen. When the revolution broke out, he had risen to the rank of brigadier-general. For his services in Italy, he was made duke of Valmy and marshal of the empire by Napoleon. The Bourbons, whose party he joined at the restoration, confirmed his title of duke, and also created him a peer of France. He died in 1820.

Kellogg, Clara Louise, American prima donna, was born at Sumterville, S. C., 1842. Her professional education was acquired in New York, except a few lessons received in London, England. She made her début in opera, 1861-62, as Gilda in Rigoletto at the academy of music, New York, and from that time rose steadily and securely in the estimation of the public, until she secured the confidence and esteem of managers and opera-goers on both sides of the Atlantic. She sang repeatedly in London, and once or twice before Queen Victoria, at Buckingham palace. She toured the United States, 1868–72; reappeared in London, 1872. She sang in Italian opera for several years and organized her own English opera company, and has appeared principally at concerts of late years. She married, 1887, Carl Strakosch, nephew of the well-known impressarios, Max and Maurice Strakosch.

Kemble, Charles, English tragedian, was born at Brecknock, in South Wales, 1775. He received his education at Douai, and on his return to England devoted himself to the stage. In 1794 he made his first appearance at Drury Lane, London, in the character of Malcolm in Macbeth. In 1806 he married Miss De Camp, a lady who had distinguished herself in high comedy. He visited the United States in 1832. Appointed examiner of plays in 1836, he performed the duties of his office by proxy until he relinquished the stage in 1840. Died, 1854.

Kemble, Frances Anne, English actress and Shakespearean reader, was born in London, 1809. She was the daughter of the celebrated Charles Kemble, and was commonly known by the name of "Fanny." She made her début at Covent Garden in 1829, and in 1832 came to the United States with her father, where she met with great success. In 1834 she married Pierce Butler, an American, and retired from the stage; but, the marriage being unhappy, she separated from her husband in 1847, obtained a divorce, and resumed her maiden name. In 1860 she left America, and from that time her residence was partly in England, partly in the United States. Died, 1893.

Kemble, John Philip, English tragedian, was born at Prescott, 1757. His father intended him for the Catholic priesthood, and sent him to a seminary at Sedgley Park, Staffordshire, and to the English college at Douai. His first appearance was at Wolverhampton in 1776. The success of his sister, Mrs. Siddons, gave him his opportunity, and in 1783 he played Hamlet at Drury Lane, and aroused the keenest interest. He continued to play leading tragic characters at Drury Lane for many years, and in 1788 became Sheridan's manager. In 1803 he purchased a share in Covent Garden theater, became manager, and made his first appearance there in the same year as Hamlet. He retired in 1817, and afterward settled at Lausanne, where he died, 1823. Kemble had no superior in his own time, as a tragedian. He was magnificently handsome; stately, if rather stiff, in bearing; and a man of remarkable intellectual power.

Kemmerer, Edwin Walter, American educator and economist, was born at Scranton, Pa., 1875. He was graduated at Wesleyan university, Connecticut, 1899; was a fellow in economics and finance, Cornell, 1899–1901; Ph. D., 1903. Kempis, Thomas à, German mystic and writer, so called from Kempen, a town in the Prussian Rhine provinces, where he was born about 1380. He was educated at Deventer, and in 1400 entered the monastery of Mount St. Agnes, near Zwolle. Here he took the vows in 1406. He entered into priest's orders in 1413, and was chosen sub-prior in 1425, to which office he was reëlected in 1448. His whole life appears to have been spent in the seclusion of this convent, where he lived to an extreme old age. His death took place in 1471, at which time he certainly had attained his ninetieth year, and most probably his ninety-second. The character of Kempis for sanctity and ascetic learning stood very high among his contemporaries, but his historical reputation rests almost entirely on his writings, which consist of sermons, ascetical treatises, pious biographies, letters, and hymns. Of these, however, the only one which deserves special notice is the celebrated ascetical treatise, Imitation of Christ, a work that in the regard of many ranks second to the Bible, and is thought likely to survive in the literature of the world as long as the Bible itself. It has been translated into all languages within, as well as others outside, the pale of Christendom. The authorship of the work was long disputed but the balance of opinion credits it to Thomas à Kempis.

Kendal, Mr. (William Hunter Grimston), English actor and manager, was born in London, 1843. He commenced his career on the stage in London, 1861, at Glasgow in 1862, where he remained until 1866, in which year he made his second appearance in London at the Haymarket theater in A Dangerous Friend. He remained there five or six years, playing such parts as Charles Surface, Captain Absolute, Romeo, Orlando, Pygmalion, etc.; went to the Court theater for a couple of seasons; from there to old Prince of Wales theater in Diplomacy, etc., back to Court theater for a season, and then became lessee and manager with John Hare, of St. James's theater 1879–88. He produced there The Queen's Shilling; The Squire; Impulse; The Iron Master; A Scrap of Paper; Lady of Lyons; As You Like It; William and Susan; Ladies' Battle, etc. He toured with Mrs. Kendal in the United States and Canada, 1889–95, with phenomenal success.

Kendal, Mrs. (Margaret Brunton Robertson), English actress, was born at Cleethorpes, Lincs, 1849. She married William Hunter Kendal (Grimston), 1869. She made her début in London, in July, 1865, as Ophelia to the Hamlet of Walter Montgomery, and in the following month she played, at the same theater, Desdemona to the Othello of Ira Aldridge. In 1867 she appeared at Drury Lane as Edith in the Great City. In 1868 she made her first decided success in London as Blanche Dumont, in the Hero of Romance. In the ensuing five years she appeared at the Haymarket as Galatea in Pygmalion and Galatea, as Selene in The Wicked World, and as Mrs. Van Brugh in Charity. The creation of the character of Lilian Vavasour in New Men and Old Acres gave Mrs. Kendal a position among the leading comédiennes of the day. In 1875 she began a short engagement at the Opéra Comique. Afterward she joined the Prince of Wales theater, where she achieved her greatest triumph as Dora in the adaptation from M. Sardou called Diplomacy. During the period 1889–95, Mr. and Mrs. Kendal played highly successful engagements in the United States and Canada.

Kent, James, American lawyer and jurist, was born in Philippi, N. Y., 1763. He was graduated at Yale college, 1781, was admitted to the bar when twenty-two years old, and soon became noted for his legal learning. He was several times elected to the New York legislature, and in 1793 became professor of law in Columbia college. Afterward he was chosen to many important offices, becoming chief-justice of New York in 1804, and chancellor, or judge of the court of chancery, in 1814. His decisions in hundreds of law cases are still often cited; but he is best known for his Commentaries on American Law, which were published from 1826 to 1830, and are now used by every American lawyer, as well as by many in other countries. He died in New York, 1847.

For many years he has been a noted corporation lawyer.

Klopsch (klŏpsh), Louis, journalist and philanthropist, was born in Germany, 1852. He was educated in the public schools of New York city, and in 1877 became proprietor of the Daily Reporter of New York. He was proprietor of the pictorial associated press, 1884–90; proprietor of the Talmage sermon syndicate after 1885, and on his return from Palestine, 1890, became interested in The Christian Herald, of which he became proprietor in 1892. Through his paper he raised and distributed over $3,300,000 in international charities, especially during the famine and distress in Russia, India, Cuba, China, and Japan. He was received in private audience by Queen Alexandra, King Christian of Denmark, king and queen of Sweden, and the dowager empress of Russia. King Edward conferred on him the gold Kaiser-I-Hind medal of the first-class, 1904. He was the originator of the red letter testament and red letter Bible. Decorated order of the rising sun by emperor of Japan, 1907. Died, 1910.

Klopstock (klŏp'-shtŏk), Friedrich Gottlieb, German poet, was born at Quedlinburg, 1724. Incited by Virgil's Æneid and Milton's Paradise Lost, he resolved to write a great epic, and as a student at Jena, in 1745, he began The Messiah. In 1746 he passed to Leipzig, where the first three cantos of The Messiah appeared in 1748. He settled in Hamburg in 1771 with a sinecure appointment, and pensions from Frederick V. of Denmark and the margrave of Baden. The last cantos of The Messiah were published in 1773. Regarded in his own time as a great religious poet, he helped to inaugurate the golden age of German literature. Odes, tragedies, biblical dramas, and hymns make up the rest of his poetry. Of these his odes alone possess interest now. The Messiah was translated into both English verse and prose. Died, 1803.

He studied violin instruction under Grün and Hellmesberger; was concertmaster of Hofburg theater orchestra, Vienna; later of Bilse's orchestra, Berlin, and concertmaster of the Boston symphony orchestra. He is especially prominent as violin soloist. Since 1905 he has been head of violin department in the institute of musical art, New York.

Kneller (nĕl'-ẽr), Sir Godfrey, noted portrait-painter, was born at Lübeck, 1646. He studied at Amsterdam and in Italy, went to London, 1675, and in 1680 was appointed court-painter. In 1693 William III. knighted him, and in 1715 George I. made him a baronet. His best-known works are the "Beauties of Hampton Court," painted for William III.; his portraits of the "Kit-Cat Club"; and of fourteen sovereigns, including Charles II. to George I., Louis XIV., Peter the Great, and the emperor Charles VI. He died at Twickenham, 1723.

Knight, Charles, English publisher and author, was born at Windsor, 1791. He early turned his attention to publishing. Among his first attempts in this department was The Etonian, a periodical supported by the Eton boys. In 1823 he started Knight's Quarterly Magazine, and continued it for some time in London. The whole of his noteworthy career was devoted to popular literature, of which he was one of the earliest and most accomplished advocates. Among the works which he published or edited are the Penny Magazine, which was started only a month or two after Chambers' Edinburgh Journal, and at one time enjoyed a circulation of nearly 200,000 copies weekly; the British Almanac, and Companion to the Almanac; Penny Cyclopædia; Library of Entertaining Knowledge; History of England, etc. He died in 1873.

He removed to Missouri in 1850; was a member of the Missouri legislature, 1858; attorney-general of Missouri, 1859–61. He returned to Kentucky in 1862, and engaged in the practice of law; was a member of congress, 1867–71 and 1877–83; governor of Kentucky, 1883–87, and delegate to Kentucky constitutional convention, 1891. He was professor of civics and economics, Centre college, 1892–94; professor of law and dean of the law faculty of same, 1894–1901. Died, 1911.

Knowles, James Sheridan, British dramatist, was born at Cork, 1784. He was the son of James Knowles, lexicographer and teacher of elocution. After serving in the militia and studying medicine, he first appeared on the stage at Bath and then at Dublin. He never attained much eminence as an actor, and subsequently conducted schools in Belfast and in Glasgow. His Caius Gracchus was first performed at Belfast. Virginius, his most effective play, had been a success in Glasgow before Macready in 1820 produced it at Covent Garden. Besides William Tell, in which Macready achieved one of his greatest triumphs, Knowles' other best plays are Love, The Hunchback, The Love Chase, and The Wife. He appeared with fair success in many of his own pieces; but about 1844 became a Baptist preacher, drew large audiences to Exeter hall, and published two anti-Roman Catholic works. He died at Torquay, 1862.

Knox, Henry, American general, was born in Boston, Mass., 1750. He had only a common school education, and became a bookseller in Boston, his store being a favorite resort of cultivated people. He was also an officer in a military company, and, when the revolution broke out, he escaped from the city with his wife, who hid his sword in the folds of her dress. He took part in the battle of Bunker Hill, soon attracted the attention of Washington by his skill in planning fortifications and his knowledge of artillery, and throughout the war he commanded the artillery in various battles. After the capture of Yorktown, congress made him a major-general, and from 1785 to 1795 he was secretary of war. He afterward lived in Maine, and died at Thomaston, in that state, 1806.

Knox, John, Scottish divine and reformer, was born at Giffordgate, in Haddingtonshire, 1505. He became a priest and notary in the diocese of St. Andrews before he had attained the age of twenty-five. Having studied the writings of St. Augustine and St. Jerome, he renounced Catholicism about 1543, and openly preached the new faith. Engaged with other reformers in defending St. Andrews against the French, he was taken prisoner, and sent to the galleys. After a detention of nineteen months, he returned to England, and was appointed chaplain to Edward VI.; but he declined to accept a bishopric at the hands of that monarch, on account of his objection to the common prayer and to Episcopacy. In the reign of Mary, he retired to Frankfort, and thence to Geneva, where he became acquainted with Calvin. Having returned to his own country in 1559, he denounced the priesthood, and especially the mass and image-worship, and declaimed against the queen of Scots, whom he called Jezebel. The queen sent for him, and sought to influence him, but in vain; and his preaching was so powerful that many of the cathedrals and parish churches were demolished by the excited populace as a result of his vigorous invectives. With tireless perseverance and vehement eloquence he labored until his death for the establishment of Protestantism in Scotland. The person of Knox was diminutive, and his frame wasted and feeble, but his energy was inexhaustible. He was the author of several works, notably of a Historie of the Reformation of Religion in Scotland. But the influence he exerted was by the tongue rather than by the pen. Died, 1572.

Knox, Philander Chase, American lawyer and statesman, was born in Brownsville, Pa., 1853. He was graduated at Mt. Union college, Ohio, 1872; LL. D., university of Pennsylvania, 1905, Yale, 1907. He was admitted to the bar, 1875; was assistant United States district attorney, Western district of Pennsylvania, 1876–77; resigned and engaged in practice since 1877 with James H. Reed under the firm name of Knox and Reed, representing many large corporations, including the Carnegie company. He was attorney-general of the United States, 1901–04; United States senator, 1904–09, and secretary of state, 1909–13. Represented United States at funeral of Emperor Mutsuhito, 1912.

Kobbé (kŏb'-ā), Gustav, American author and journalist, was born in New York, 1857. He was graduated at Columbia university, 1877; Columbia law school, 1879. He engaged in newspaper and magazine work, chiefly on musical and dramatic subjects. Koch (kōx), Robert, German physician and bacteriologist, was born at Clausthal, Prussia, 1843. He studied medicine at Göttingen, receiving his doctor's degree in 1866. His first substantial achievement was the result of the penetration, skill, and thoroughness of his researches on the contagion of splenic fever in cattle. This gained for him a seat on the imperial board of health in 1880. In 1879 he had begun his investigations into the causes of consumption, and in 1882 he announced the discovery of the tubercle bacillus before the physiological society of Berlin.

In 1883 he was made a privy-councilor, and placed in charge of the German expedition sent to Egypt and India to investigate the causes of cholera. This journey resulted in the discovery of the comma bacillus, or cholera germ, in 1884. He was rewarded with a gift of 100,000 marks by the government, and imperial titles and honors were showered upon him. In 1885 he was appointed a professor in the university of Berlin, the new chair of hygiene being created for him, and was made director of the hygienic institute. He subsequently returned to the investigation of tubercular diseases, but five years of patient research were required before he was able to announce to the world his treatment for consumption and its allied diseases. In 1905 he was awarded the Nobel prize for achievements in physiology. Died, 1910.

Kohlsaat (kōl′-sät), Hermann Henry, capitalist, journalist, was born in Albion, Ill., 1853. He was educated in the common schools, and began business life as cash boy and later cashier in dry-goods store. He was traveling salesman, 1875–80, for Blake, Shaw and company, wholesale bakers; became junior partner, 1880, and had charge of a bakery lunch established by this firm. He bought that branch of the business, 1883, greatly enlarged it, and the firm of H. H. Kohlsaat and company now owns several large establishments devoted to the wholesale bakery business. He was part owner of the Chicago Inter-Ocean, 1891–93; was editor and publisher of Chicago Times-Herald, 1894, amalgamated with Chicago Record, becoming Record-Herald in 1901, also of Chicago Evening Post, 1894–1901. He retired from the Record-Herald, 1902, but again became editor in 1910. Bought Chicago Inter-Ocean, 1912. He presented a statue of General Grant to the city of Galena, Ill., and has contributed largely to charities.

Komura (kō′-mōō-rä), Count Jutaro, Japanese statesman, minister for foreign affairs, 1908–11; was born at Hyuga, 1855. He was educated at the university of Tokyo, and at Harvard university law school. Was chargé d'affaires in China, 1893-94; minister to Korea, 1895-96; vice-minister for foreign affairs, 1896–98; minister to United States, Russia, China, 1898–1901; minister for foreign affairs, 1901–06; senior plenipotentiary to the peace conference, and signed, with Takahira, peace treaty at Portsmouth, N. H., 1905; sent to China as special ambassador, 1905, and Japanese ambassador to Great Britain, 1906–08. Died, 1911.

Körner (kûr′-nĕr), Karl Theodor, German lyric poet, was born at Dresden, 1791. He studied at Freiberg, Leipzig, and Berlin, and in 1811 settled at Vienna. Here he was dramatist to a Vienna theater, and wrote some light comedies, among them Der Grüne Domino and Der Nachtwächter, and some tragedies, of which Zriny was the most successful. The uprising of the German nation against Napoleon inspired him with patriotic ardor, and in 1813, joining Lützow's corps, he distinguished himself by his valor and encouraged his comrades by fiery patriotic songs, published in 1814 under the title of Leier und Schwert. The most famous, Das Schwert-Lied, was dashed off in a pause of battle only a few hours before the author fell at Gadebusch near Schwerin, 1813.

Kosciusko (kŏs′-ĭ-ŭs′-kō), Thaddeus, Polish general and patriot, was born in Minsk, West Russia, 1746. He became a captain in the Polish army, came to America and served in the war of independence, and returned to Poland in 1786, with the rank of general. Having become commander of the Polish army, Kosciusko resigned his command at the second partition of Poland, and retired to Leipzig, but returned in 1794, and put himself at the head of the national movement in Cracow, and afterward in Warsaw. With 20,000 regular troops and 40,000 ill-armed peasants he resisted for months the united Russian and Prussian army of 150,000 men. Overpowered by superior numbers in the battle of Maciejowice, 1794, he was captured and kept a prisoner until after the accession of the emperor Paul. When Napoleon, in 1806, formed a plan for the restoration of Poland, Kosciusko felt himself restrained from taking an active part in it by his promise to the emperor Paul. In 1814 he wrote to the emperor Alexander, entreating him to grant an amnesty to the Poles in foreign countries, and to make himself constitutional king of Poland. He released from servitude, in 1817, the peasants on his own estate in Poland. His death took place in 1817, in consequence of a fall from his horse.

Kossuth (kŏsh′-ōōt), Francis, son of Louis Kossuth, leader of the independence party in the Hungarian parliament, was born in 1841. He suffered exile with his father, was partly educated in England, and lived in France and Italy. After his father's death in 1894 he went back to Hungary, took the oath of allegiance as a Hungarian subject, and soon became leader of those aspiring to national independence. In 1903 he resigned the leadership, but was soon back at his post, and in 1904 he united his opposition forces with those of Count Apponyi, and won the elections in 1905. When the coalition came into office in 1906 he became minister of commerce in the Wekérle cabinet.

Kossuth, Louis, Hungarian patriot, orator and leader, was born at Monok, 1802. In 1832 he commenced his political career as editor of a liberal paper. In 1847 he was sent by the county of Pesth as deputy to the Hungarian diet. To his speeches must in part be ascribed not only the Hungarian revolution, but the insurrection in Vienna in 1848. On the dissolution of the ministry in 1848, he found himself at the head of the committee of national defense, and now prosecuted with extraordinary energy the measures necessary for carrying on the war. To put an end to all the hopes and schemes of the moderate party he induced the national assembly at Debreczin, in 1849, to declare the independence of Hungary, and that the Hapsburg dynasty had forfeited the throne. He was then appointed provisional governor of Hungary. In 1849 he was compelled to abandon his position, and to flee into Turkey, where, however, he was made a prisoner. In 1851 he was liberated, and the government of France refusing him a passage through their territory, he sailed in an American frigate to England, where he was received with every demonstration of public respect and sympathy. In December of the same year he landed in the United States, where he met with a most enthusiastic reception. He returned in 1852 to England, and there he chiefly resided until the Italian war broke out against Austria, when he organized an Hungarian legion in Italy. Later he lived in Turin until his death in 1894.

Kotzebue (kōt′-se-bōō), Augustus Frederic Ferdinand von, German dramatist and historic writer, was born at Weimar, 1761, and was educated at Jena and Duisburg. In his twentieth year he was invited to St. Petersburg by the Prussian ambassador, and was patronized by Catharine, who raised him from post to post, until he became president of the civil government at Revel, a station which he held for ten years. From 1795 until 1800 he resided, variously occupied, in Germany and France. In the latter year he returned to Russia, but had no sooner set foot on its territory than he was seized and banished to Siberia. The capricious tyrant Paul soon, however, recalled him, and took him into favor. In 1801 he again left Russia and spent the remainder of his life in innumerable literary productions, and in politics. He is said to have written many of the Russian state papers and proclamations. The emperor Alexander subsequently employed him in various posts, and in 1817 appointed him his literary correspondent in Germany. This invidious office Kotzebue is said to have filled in a manner hostile to the freedom of his native country; and for this supposed crime he was assassinated in 1819 by a youthful fanatic named Sand. His dramas amount to nearly three hundred. Among his other works are: History of the German Empire, History of Ancient Prussia, and various narratives and recollections of his travels.

Krauskopf (krous'-kŏpf), Joseph, rabbi, lecturer, and author, was born in Ostrowo, Prussia, 1858. He came to America in 1872, worked as clerk at Fall River, Mass. He was graduated at the university of Cincinnati, 1883, and as rabbi from Hebrew Union college, 1883; D. D., 1885. Soon after graduation he accepted a call from a Hebrew congregation at Kansas City; was rabbi of the reform congregation, Keneseth Israel, Philadelphia, 1887; founded the Jewish publication society of America; founded, and has been president since organization of the National farm school, in which Jewish boys are trained in practical and scientific agriculture. Author: The Jews and Moors in Spain; Evolution and Judaism; A Rabbi's Impressions of the Oberammergau Passion Play; The Seven Ages of Man; Old Truths in New Books; Society and its Morals; Some Isms of To-day; Gleanings from Our Vineyard; The Service Manual; The Service Ritual; The Mourner's Service; The School Service; Sunday Lectures, etc.

Krehbiel (krā'-bēl), Henry E., musical critic, was born at Ann Arbor, Mich., 1854; studied law in Cincinnati, 1872–74; musical critic, Cincinnati Gazette, 1874–80; musical critic, New York Tribune, since 1880; chevalier of legion of honor, 1901. Author: Studies in Wagnerian Drama, How to Listen to Music, etc. Editor: Annotated Bibliography of Fine Arts.

Kropotkin (krȯ-pôt'-kēn), Prince Peter, Russian socialist, writer, was born at Moscow, 1842. At fifteen he entered the corps of pages at St. Petersburg, where, after five years' service and exploration in Siberia, he returned in 1867 to study mathematics at the university, while acting as secretary to the geographical society. In 1871 he explored the glacial deposits of Finland and Sweden; in 1872, while on a visit to Belgium and Switzerland, he associated himself with the extremest section of the International. In 1874, after his return to Russia, he was arrested, but in 1876 effected his escape to England. In France at Lyons he was condemned, in 1883, to five years' imprisonment for anarchism, but was released in 1886 and returned to England. Author: In Russian and French Prisons; The State, its Part in History; Fields, Factories, and Workshops; Mutual Aid, a Factor of Evolution; Modern Science and Anarchism; Ideals and Realities in Russian Literature; The Conquest of Bread; The Great Revolution, 1789–1903; etc.

Kruger (krōō'-ger), Stephanus Johannes Paulus, Boer statesman, was born in Colesberg in Cape Colony, 1825. With his family he "trekked" to Natal, the Orange river free state, and the Transvaal, and won such a reputation for cleverness, coolness, and courage that in the war against England, in 1881, he was appointed head of the provisional government. In 1883 he was elected president of the Transvaal or South African republic, and again in 1888, 1893, and 1898. "Oom Paul" was the soul of the policy that issued in the so-called Boer war of 1899–1902, showed consummate resolution and energy, and, after the tide had fairly turned against the Boers, went to Europe to seek alliances against Britain. He made his headquarters at Utrecht, and thence issued The Memoirs of Paul Kruger, told by Himself. He died, 1904.

Krupp (krŏŏp), Alfred, German ironmaster, was born at Essen, Prussia, 1812. He succeeded his father, Friedrich Krupp, who had founded a small iron-forge there in 1810. Krupp established the first Bessemer steel works and the first forging-hammer erected in Germany. The first steel gun manufactured by him, in 1847, was a 3-pounder muzzle-loader; in 1880 at the Düsseldorf exhibition he showed the first 100-ton steel gun. He acquired large mines and collieries, every year saw additions made to his works, and they are now the chief American competitors in the manufacture of armor for warships. They now employ about 50,000 persons, and are possibly the most extensive works of the kind in the world. Krupp died in 1887.

Kubelik (kōō'-bĕ-lĭk), Jan, Bohemian violinist, was born in 1880 at Michle, near Prague. He received his first musical lessons from his father, a market gardener, and at twelve entered the Prague conservatoire, where his natural talent, coupled with assiduity, attracted attention. He was very successful at concerts in Austria-Hungary prior to appearing in Berlin with the Philharmonic orchestra, 1900. He was then invited to England by Dr. Richter, and made his début at St. James's hall. In 1905 he began a two years' tour round the world, and met with high favor throughout Europe and America.

Kuenen (kü'-nen), Abraham, Dutch theologian, was born at Haarlem, 1828. He studied at Leyden and became, in 1853, a professor there. His first important work was his Historico-Critical Inquiry into the Old Testament, the result of which was to reconstruct the history of Israel, the priestly code and the historical portions connected with it being made the latest element in the pentateuch. This view was developed further in a succeeding volume. He also delivered a series of lectures on the Hibbert foundation, since published under the title National Religions and Universal Religions. He died at Leyden, 1891.

Kugler (kōōg'-lĕr), Franz Theodor, German historian of art, was born at Stettin, 1808, and studied at Heidelberg and Berlin. After the completion of a very diversified course of study he devoted himself to the study of the fine arts. In 1833 he became a professor at the art academy in Berlin. His most valuable work is the Manual of the History of Art. He is also favorably known as a poet and as the author of several dramas. Died, 1858.

Kuroki (kōō'-rō-kē), General, Count, noted Japanese general, was born at Satsuma, 1844. He was a colonel on the imperialist side during the Satsuma rebellion of 1877, distinguished himself in the war with China in 1895, and was promoted a general in 1903. He commanded the first army in the Russo-Japanese war, 1904-05, and was victorious at Yalu, Kiu-lien-ling, Liao-Yang, Mukden, etc. In 1906 he became inspector-general of the Japanese army, and subsequently made a tour of the United States.

Kuropatkin (kŏŏ'-rŏ-păt'-kĭn), Alexei Nicholaevitch, Russian general, was born in the government of Pskov, 1848. After receiving an excellent education in the Russian military schools, he entered the army and distinguished himself in the war against the Bokharans. He served in the Russo-Turkish war; was governor of Transcaspia, 1890–98; and in 1904 was made commander-in-chief of the Russian army during the Russo-Japanese war. In 1905 he was succeeded by General Linevich, and was appointed to command the first Manchurian army. He wrote works on the Balkan campaign, and on the central Asian wars.

Kutusoff (kŏŏ-tŏŏ'-zŏf), Mikhail, I. G., prince of Smolensk, Russian field-marshal, was born in 1745. He early entered the Russian army, distinguished himself in the Turkish wars, and in 1787 was appointed governor-general of Crimea. After various other services he was appointed in 1805 to the command of the first corps d'armée against the French. In that year he was victorious over Marshal Mortier at Dürenstein. He was second in command of the allied army, of which Emperor Alexander himself was commander-in-chief, at Austerlitz. In 1811-12 he commanded the Russian army in the war against the Turks, and, notwithstanding his advanced age, succeeded Barclay de Tolly in 1812 as commander-in-chief of the army against the French, and obtained a great victory over Davout and Ney at Smolensk. He carried on the campaign to its successful termination, but his strength was exhausted, and he died in 1813.

Kuyper (koi'-pĕr), Abraham, Dutch theologian, statesman, and writer, was born at Maassluis, 1837. He was graduated at the university of Leyden; D. Sc., Delft; Ph. D., Hope college; LL. D., Princeton; D. D., Leyden. He was pastor of the Reformed church at Beest, 1863; Utrecht, 1868; Amsterdam, 1870; member of the states-general for Gonda, 1874–77; for Sliedrecht, 1894–1901, and prime minister, 1901–05. He founded the free university at Amsterdam, 1880; became professor of theology and literature there; founded the daily Standard and became its chief editor, 1872; the Heraut, 1878; and founded the Reformed Free churches, 1886. He lectured in America, England, and Belgium, and in 1897 was president of Netherland press association. He edited the Encyclopædia of Sacred Theology, and is the author of the following works: The Work of the Holy Spirit; Calvinism; From the Scriptures; The Common Grace; Political Platform of the Anti-Revolutionary Party; The Incarnation; Socialism and Christianity; The Evolution; The South African Crisis; Common Grace, 3 vols.; Varia Americana; Around the Old World, etc.

Lackaye, Wilton, actor, was born in Virginia, 1864. He studied law for one year; began his stage career in Francesca da Rimini in New York, 1883. His principal rôles have been Prince Saviani in Jocelyn; Don Stephano in Featherbrain; Jefferson Stockton in Aristocracy; Solomon Strong in The Idler; Svengali in Trilby; Curtis Jadwin in The Pit; Jean Valjean in The Law and the Man; John Haggleton in The Battle.

Lacordaire (lȧ'-kōr'-dâr'), Jean Baptiste Henri, French divine, was born at Recey-sur-Ource, 1802. He went to Paris in 1821 to continue his legal studies. In 1824 he gave up law for theology, and after three years at the seminary of St. Sulpice, he was ordained priest in 1827, and became chaplain to a convent and to the Collège Henri IV. He assisted Lamennais and Montalembert to found the Avenir, and was once summoned for opposing the government. A free school opened in Paris by him and Montalembert was closed by the police; and the Avenir, condemned by the pope, was given up. In 1834 Lacordaire gave a series of "conferences" or lectures to students which attracted great attention, and led the way to his famous conferences in Notre Dame, Paris, in 1835-36. His success as a preacher was at its height, when he withdrew and went to Rome. In 1839 he entered the Dominican order, and in 1840 reappeared in the pulpit of Notre Dame, where, from 1843 to 1851 he continued his conferences. In 1848 Lacordaire accepted the republic, and was elected to the constituent assembly, but resigned in ten days. His last conferences, delivered at Toulouse in 1854, are the most eloquent of all Thenceforward until his death, in 1861, he was director of the military school of Sorrèze. He was a member of the academy.

Lacretelle (lȧ'-krĕ-tĕl'), Jean Charles Dominique de, French historian and journalist, was born at Metz, 1766. He was attracted to Paris on the outbreak of the revolution; and, taking up journalism, helped to edit the Journal des Débats and the Journal de Paris. In 1809 he was made professor of history at the university of Paris where he remained until 1848. In 1810 censor of the press, and in 1808–12 published his History of France in the Eighteenth Century, a work of high merit. From 1811 a member of the French academy, he became its president in 1816. He died near Mâcon, 1855.

Lacroix (lȧ'-krwä'), General de, French general, vice-president of the supreme council of war and commander-in-chief of the French army, was born in 1844. He was educated at St. Cyr, which he left to serve in Italy. In the Franco-Prussian war he was taken prisoner at Sedan. He served in the French expedition to Tonquin, and in 1902 succeeded General Bonnal at the École de Guerre. In 1903 he was appointed military governor of Lyons and commander of the fourteenth army corps. He succeeded General Hagron in his present post in 1907.

Lactantius (lăk-tăn'-shĭ-us), Lucius Cælius, Firmianus, Christian apologist, was born in the latter part of the third century. He was brought up in Africa, and settled as a teacher of rhetoric in Nicomedia in Bithynia, where he was converted by witnessing the constancy of the Christian martyrs under the persecution of Diocletian. About 313 he was invited to Gaul by Constantine, to act as tutor to his son Crispus, and died about 325. His most important work is Divinarum Institutionum libri vii., which is a vindication of Christianity, and an exposure of the paganism he had formerly professed. His other writings include the treatises De Ira Dei and De Mortibus Persecutorum.

Ladd, George Trumbull, American educator, professor of philosophy at Yale university, 1881–1905, emeritus professor, 1905; was born in Painesville, Ohio, 1842. He was graduated at Western Reserve college, 1864, Andover theological seminary, 1869; D. D., 1879, LL. D., 1895, Western Reserve; LL. D., Princeton, 1896. La Farge (lȧ färzh'), John, American artist, was born in New York, 1835. He studied architectural decoration, then painting with Couture and William M. Hunt. He began painting with religious subjects and decorative work; painted flowers, a few portraits, and many landscapes; for a short time made illustrations for books and magazines; then devoted himself to mural painting, mostly of religious or ecclesiastical character; afterward was for years devoted to the making of stained glass windows, for which he invented the new methods known in Europe as "American," changing and reforming entire art of the glass-stainer, from the making of the new glass by new methods to the painting of same; much of his work is in churches and residences in Boston, New York, Chicago, Cleveland, Philadelphia, Washington, Detroit, and elsewhere. Author: Lectures on Art, Letters from Japan, etc. Died, 1910.

Lafayette (lä'-fā-yĕt'), Marie Jean Paul Roch Yves Gilbert Motier, Marquis de, French general and statesman, descended from an ancient family of Auvergne; he was born in the castle of Chavagnac, now in the department of upper Loire, 1757. He became a soldier at an early age, and in 1777 came to America to take part with the colonists in the war of independence. The friendship of Washington exercised a great influence over the development of his mind and the formation of his opinions. The declaration of war between France and Britain gave him an opportunity of aiding the new republic effectually by returning to France, where he was received with honor by the court, and with enthusiasm by the people. He again came to America in 1780, and was intrusted by congress with the defense of Virginia, where he rendered important services. He had imbibed liberal principles, and on his second return to France eagerly sought to promote a thorough reform in his native country. He was called to the assembly of notables in 1787, and was one of those who most earnestly urged the summoning of the states-general. He took part also in the movements which converted the assembly of the states into the national assembly in 1789. He took a very active part in the proceedings of the assembly, and, being appointed to the chief command of the armed citizens, laid the foundation of the national guard, and gave it the tricolor cockade. The extreme French republicans soon came to dislike him, because he advocated a constitutional kingdom; and the court-party, especially the queen, did the same — in spite of the services he rendered them — because of his zeal for the new order of things. Along with Bailly he founded the club of the Feuillants. After the adoption of the constitution of 1790 he retired to his estate of Lagrange until he received the command of the army of Ardennes, with which he won the first victories at Philippeville, Maubeuge, and Florennes. Nevertheless, the calumnies of the Jacobins rendered him exceedingly unpopular, and he was accused of treason, but acquitted. After several vain efforts to maintain the cause of national liberty, he left Paris for Flanders, but was taken prisoner by the Austrians, and remained at Olmütz until Bonaparte obtained his liberation in 1797; but he took no part in public affairs during the ascendancy of Bonaparte. He sat in the chamber of deputies from 1818 to 1824, and from 1825 to 1830. In 1824 he revisited America by invitation of congress, which voted him a grant of $200,000 and a township of land. In 1830 he took an active part in the revolution, and commanded the national guards. Died, 1834.

Laffitte (lȧ'-fēt'), Jacques, French banker and statesman, was born at Bayonne, France, 1767. He acquired great wealth as a Paris banker, and in 1814 became governor of the bank of France. After the second restoration he joined the opposition in the chamber of deputies, and was elected by all twenty sections in Paris, 1817. In 1830 his house was the headquarters of the revolution, and he supplied a great part of the funds needed. In November he formed a cabinet, but he held power only until March. Meanwhile he had to sell his property to pay his debts. A national subscription preserved him his house in Paris; and from the ruins of his fortune he founded a discount bank in 1837. As the government became less liberal, Laffitte became more active in opposition; in 1843 he was elected president of the chamber of deputies. Died, 1844.

La Follette (lä fŏl'-ĕt), Robert Marion, lawyer, statesman, was born in Primrose, Wis., 1855. He was graduated at the university of Wisconsin, 1879; LL. D., 1901; was admitted to the bar, 1880, and became district attorney of Dane county, 1880. He was a member of congress, 1885–91, and as member of the ways and means committee took a prominent part in framing the McKinley bill. He was elected governor of Wisconsin in 1901, 1903, and 1905; and led the movement to nominate all candidates by direct vote, adopted by his state, 1904; to tax railway property by same system and at same rate as other taxable property, adopted, 1903; and also for the control of railway rates within the state by state commission enacted into a law by the legislature of 1905. He resigned the governorship on being elected United States senator in 1905. He has made important contributions toward railroad and other public reforms, and is regarded as one of the ablest debaters and orators in the United States senate, to which he was re-elected, 1911. He is now editor and proprietor of a weekly periodical known as La Follette's Magazine.

Lafontaine (lȧ-fôɴ'-tĕn'), Jean de, French poet and fabulist, was born at Château Thierry in Champagne, 1621. He early devoted himself to the study of the old writers and to verse writing. In 1654 he published a verse translation of the Eunuchus of Terence, and then went to Paris, where Fouquet awarded him a pension of 1,000 francs for a piece of verse quarterly. His Contes et Nouvelles en Vers appeared in 1665, his Fables Choisies mises en Vers in 1668, and his Amours de Psyché et de Cupidon in 1669. For nearly twenty years he was maintained in the household of Mme. de la Sablière. In 1684 he read an admirable Discourse en Vers on his reception by the academy. The subjects of the Contes are taken from Boccaccio, Ariosto, Machiavelli, Rabelais, the Heptameron, Apuleius, Athenæus, and other writers; and the stories are retold with inimitable skill and wit. He was a great and brilliant writer, but not a great poet. Died, 1695.

Lagrange (lȧ'-gräɴzh'), Joseph Louis, Count, mathematician, was born in Turin, 1736, of French extraction. He became professor of mathematics in Turin at the age of nineteen. In 1766 he succeeded Euler as director of the academy of Berlin. Removing to Paris in 1787, he remained there during the revolution, was afterward patronized by Napoleon, and created by him a count and a senator. Of his well-known works the Mécanique Analytique is the most celebrated. Died, 1813.

Lalande (lȧ'-läɴd'), Joseph Jérôme Le Français de, French astronomer, was born at Bourg-en-Bresse, 1732. He devoted himself with such success to mathematics and astronomy that the French academy sent him to Berlin, 1751, to determine the moon's parallax. He became on his return an astronomer-royal, and from 1762 professor of astronomy in the Collège de France, from 1795 director of the Paris observatory. His chief work is Traité d'Astronomie. Died, 1807.

Lally-Tollendal (lȧ′-lē′ tō′-läN′-dȧl′), Thomas Arthur, Comte de Lally and Baron de Tollendal, French general, of Irish descent, was born at Romans in Dauphiné, 1702. His father, Sir Gerard Lally, was an Irish Jacobite refugee in the French service. Lally distinguished himself at Flanders, accompanied Prince Charles Edward to Scotland in 1745, and in 1756 became commander-in-chief in the French East Indies. He commenced vigorous hostilities against the British, and besieged Madras; but, being defeated, retreated to Pondicherry, which was attacked in 1760 by a superior British force. Lally capitulated in 1761, after ten months' siege, and was conveyed to England. Accused of cowardice, he returned to France, and was thrown into the Bastille. The parliament of Paris at last condemned him, and he was executed in 1766. But his son, supported by Voltaire, procured a royal decree in 1778, declaring the condemnation unjust, and restoring all the forfeited honors.
